"BDS, from the very beginning, has served as the core element of a strategy to isolate and delegitimize Israel. It was never about creating an economic impact, rather it was about undermining and diminishing Israel's credibility," he said.

"The notion that one can endorse any level of a boycott without lending strength to the overall assault on the Jewish state is like declaring a woman 'half pregnant.' However nuanced Beinart may think his message is, he had a responsibility to appreciate how it would be exploited by those who are committed to Israel's demise.

"On a more fundamental level, Beinart is guilty of the most basic and insidious of historical inversions of the Arab-Israel conflict. Israel's presence in the territories comes as a result of the conflict rather than representing its root cause. What is necessary to move towards resolution is not Israel's unilateral evacuation of Judea and Samaria – it is the unequivocal and meaningful acceptance of the legitimacy of Israel as a Jewish state in the ancestral homeland of the Jewish people," Fogel said.

"Those who believe in a two-state solution cannot accept the premise of his position, and even the most strident of anti-Israel voices, including Noam Chomsky and Norman Finkelstein, have repudiated BDS, understanding it for what it is – a cynical and destructive ploy to demonize the Jewish state."

Seth Mandel, writing on the Contentions blog at the conservative Commentary magazine, assailed Beinart's boycott proposal as well as his labelling of Israel proper as "democratic Israel" and Israeli settlements as "non-democratic Israel." Mandel called these arguments "both morally reprehensible and a dangerous slippery slope."

"The slippery slope, of course, is that the 'legitimate' vs. 'illegitimate' argument will immediately be applied to those, anywhere and anytime, who voice any support for the Jews Beinart says to stay away from," Mandel wrote.

Jeffrey Goldberg, a writer for The Atlantic, who also has harshly criticized the West Bank settlement enterprise, chose the path of engagement, parrying with Beinart in a much-watched exchange on Twitter.

"What's your alternative for stopping the settlement growth that dooms Israeli democracy?" Beinart asked Goldberg.

Goldberg replied: "Longer discussion, but int'l boycott will only make mainstream Israelis more sympathetic to settlers, not less."

Centrist Jewish groups were critical of Beinart's proposal.

"I don't think a JCRC would support any organization that would support any kind of activity that would bring any harm to a segment of Israel," said Ronald Halber, executive director of the Jewish Community Relations Council of Greater Washington.

Halber said he did not think Beinart would become a pariah in the Jewish community, arguing that it "sounds like he wrote the piece more to start a discussion than advance the proposal.

"I find it a less than serious proposal from a person I consider thoughtful," he said.

Idan Raichel plays Toronto for a cause

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Some 1,500 cheering, raucous fans of Israeli world music can't be wrong.

That was the audience count at the Idan Raichel Project's performance at Queen Elizabeth Theatre in Toronto on March 18.

Raichel and his troupe were in town to play a charity concert in support of the Motek Cultural Initiative, a newly created non-profit aimed at bringing Israeli artists to North Americans to expose western audiences to all Israel has to offer.

Proceeds from the ticket sales went toward launching the venture, and Raichel said it was his privilege to kick off the project as a favour to his friend and the non-profit's founder, Ravid Dahan.

Speaking to Heebonics just before taking the stage, dressed in black with his trademark black headscarf concealing some of his long dreads, Raichel said he hoped his music could teach cultures how to live more peacefully with each other.

A wildly popular artist in the world music genre both in Israel and internationally, Raichel humbly noted that his band, while representative of Israel and proudly so, was not officially employed by the government to be a cultural ambassador for his country.

However, he said, it has been an honour for him to read international reviews of his albums and be defined as "the sound track of Israel for the past decade."

Raichel, who grew up in Kfar Saba near Tel Aviv, first burst onto the Israeli music scene in 2002.

Idan Raichel [Patrick Jubé photos]

"If people listen to the Idan Raichel Project, and what comes to their minds is the sound track of the streets of Tel Aviv, then we should... be goodwill and cultural ambassadors for our country," he said.

Raichel said he aspires to be to Israel what other iconic international artists have become to their countries.

"Edith Piaf for the French people, or Mercedes Sosa for Argentina, or the Buena Vista Social Club for Cubans. We would have the honour to be this for Israel," he said.

Asked how he felt about Israel's portrayal in the news as a conflict zone and whether that ever influences his compositions, Raichel said it was unfortunate that many people outside of Israel only know it as an actor in a volatile region.

"It's important that people learn more about [Israeli] culture and other aspects of our reality. What Ravid is doing here is a blessing.

"At the end of the day, all the Israeli artists coming [to Canada] are great artists," he said.

Raichel also pointed out that he has always felt welcomed in Canada wherever he's played.

Musically speaking, Raichel said he's at a point now in his writing where he feels much more comfortable and confident.

Growing up playing with musician-neighbours and with other Israeli artists helped form his style, but he said he is not a prolific writer because his music comes from an "intuitive" place, which takes time to form.

"I write when I have something to say. If I don't have anything to say, I don't write it. It's just a great privilege to be a recording artist who is just recording his life. It's a complementary process," Raichel said.

With that, he politely left to prepare for the March 18 show. And what a show it was.

From the mood-setting introduction of the band by a flautist playing Middle Eastern scales on digital delay under a canopy of violet lighting through to climactic numbers showcasing the Idan Raichel Project's breadth and width of musicianship and verve, it was a concert that imparted the spirit of multiculturalism, done the Israeli way.

The Israeli artist also managed to squeeze in a second performance the following day.

On March 19, Raichel played a set at York University.

He performed for students at the university to promote his message of peace and tolerance through music.

The York event was co-sponsored by the university and the Israeli consulate in Toronto.

Raichel's appearance at York was cause for numerous student campus groups to rally around and provide support to the Jewish and pro-Israel community at the university.

Campus groups supporting Raichel's performance at York last week included the Ahmadiyya Students Club, Ethiopian Students Association, Filipino Student Association, Greek Students Association, Hasbara Fellowships, Hillel at York, Latin American Students Association, Osgoode Campus Conservatives, Power to Change, Schulich Finance Association, Schulich Management Association and the York United Black Students Association.

Consulate spokesperson Natalie Weed said her office wished to highlight Raichel's desire "for people of all cultures to work together. We asked the students to support the concert as a symbol of multiculturalism and as a symbol of unity. York receives so much negative press, and the students want to see positive interaction between students from all different backgrounds and between the student groups."

Bialik's Daffodil and Tulip project

I recently read The Third Industrial Revolution by Jeremy Rifkin. In a nutshell, the book makes the argument for the need for society and business to prepare today for the convergence of communication and energy technologies that will once again lead to another "Industrial Revolution."

Rifkin proposes that the next Industrial Revolution will come about when five different elements, which exist today at different levels of maturity and highlight advances in communication and energy technology, will be brought together in a new way.

He sees this happening through a convergence of renewable energy technology – buildings of all types capable of becoming micro power plants, the ability for those buildings to store intermittently generated energy combining with ability to share and consume energy by plugging into an energy sharing "intergrid," and finally linked by transitioning the current transportation vehicles such as cars and trucks to share and consume power in this two-directional intergrid.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

One of the keys to making this a reality, Rifkin believes, would be changing the educational experience. This would require moving from the current focus of helping students become competitive, autonomous and economically productive to an experience that is more focused on distributed and collaborative learning.

This approach would mirror the way students share information, ideas and experiences on the Internet in open learning spaces and social media sites. Rifkin sees this distributed and collaborative learning effort as critical preparation for those who will be participating in an economy that operates on the same set of principles and will eventually lead to a more inclusive community with empathy for the sustainability of our biosphere. The Bialik Hebrew Day School Israel Interactive Centre, under the leadership of Nurith Sela, is putting this new learning approach into practice through an International Education and Resources Network (iEARN) project known as the Daffodil and Tulip collaborative global education project.

This project was originated by Ruty Hotzen in Israel and is one of many global projects that iEARN provides for schools around the world.

In November 2011, Grade 3 Bialik students planted daffodil and tulip bulbs in the front of their school and Grade 3 students from Hashalom-Yitzhak Rabin School in Jerusalem also planted bulbs in their schoolyard.

Students from both schools will collect, communicate and share information through an iEARN provided and supervised online discussion capability. They will explore common parameters affecting plant growth at both locations, including air and soil temperature, sunlight and pollution. This collaborative learning activity is connected to Bialik's Grade 3 science unit about plants and soil and meets the new expectations of the school's technology curriculum for technology operation and communication, such as using digital media to communicate collaborate and share information.

This project provides the students with the opportunity to develop 21st-century learning skills. The live correspondence in Hebrew with their peers in Israel provides them with the opportunity to enrich their Hebrew vocabulary and enhance their ties with Israel. Their understanding of environmental impacts to sustainable growth, in this case of daffodils and tulips, will be a lifelong lesson.

Canadian: insulin, the telephone, residential schools

The Canadian personality is in some ways immature.

Canadians embrace Canadian things we're proud of, such as the invention of the telephone by Alexander Graham Bell in 1876, Banting and Best's discovery of insulin in 1922, and the creation of Trivial Pursuit in 1979 by Chris Haney and Scott Abbott.

But Canadians – our own Jewish community included – generally don't take ownership of the atrocities committed in 132 Canadian residential schools from 1840 to 1996, when Canadian racism was at its peak and many of our government officials, security forces and church "leaders" terrorized our aboriginal peoples.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

"O Canada, our home and native land"?

We celebrate the good chapters in our history, but respond to the bad things with, "Well, I wasn't there." But residential schools are as much part of our peoplehood as Stalinism was to Russia's, and our failure to accept this fact reflects our compartmentalized relationship to our own history.

Residential schools were established by the federal government to show our native peoples the "superiority" of European-Canadian society – "to kill the Indian in the child." Children were taken from their parents and sent away to schools that were often run by sexually abusive teachers. Native children, including Inuit and Métis, weren't allowed to speak their languages or practise their religion. The book A Stranger at Home reveals the terror a child felt upon returning home from a residential school and hearing her mother yell, "She's not my daughter," a statement that reflected the distance created between the two.

It's not clear how many aboriginal children died or were killed in residential schools by our Canadian ancestors, but documentation by Dr. Peter Bryce, general medical superintendent for the Department of Indian Affairs in the early 20th century, reported to the ministry that from 1894 to 1908, the mortality rate in Western Canadian residential Schools was between 35 and 60 per cent, representing about 50,000 of our children over that time (see http://bit.ly/peKha).

"True patriot love"?

As a Canadian, as a Jew, I'm sickened to share with you that in 1928, Alberta's Sexual Sterilization Act was passed, allowing students of a residential school to be sterilized with the principal's approval At least 3,500 young native females were sterilized this way. Knowing this, I can understand the feelings of young Germans today when dealing with aspects of their country's past.

"The True North strong and free"!?

We know native children were murdered in Canada because of a cultural genocide orchestrated by our government. (Prime Minister Stephen Harper has apologized for this.) We know Ojibwa mothers had their hearts torn out while RCMP officers, following orders, tore their kids away from them as their fathers stood by, emasculated. Yet you won't find any of this in most board of education history books. You have to squint to find a memorial to our native children. You won't find a Jewish-native committee.

"We stand on guard for thee"?

Just as we were present in spirit when Banting and Best discovered a serum that would save the lives of our family members, we were equally represented when 132 residential schools operated across Canada and systematically destroyed the lives of our aboriginal people. Canadian history – blemished and glowing – is ours.

To be Canadian is to be compassionate. To be Canadian is to be destructive. But it's also to be much more. Either way, pledge "Never again" to residential schools. Embrace our history in its entirety and ensure a better future for our native people.

"With glowing hearts"? Not entirely.

UNRWA Briefing

OTTAWA — York Centre MP Mark Adler organized a briefing on the state of Arab refugee camps in the Palestinian territories by three Middle East experts in Ottawa last week. David Bedein, director of the Center for Near East Policy Research; Arnon Groiss, a senior journalist for the Israel Broadcasting Authority's Arabic Radio and an expert on the translation of schoolbooks in UNRWA schools, and Jonathan Halevi, senior researcher on radical Islam at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, spoke to MPs, senators and political staffers March 27 in Ottawa. Their talk was titled "Reform of UNRWA: To encourage the resettlement of Arab refugee descendants, so as not to perpetuate their indignity in refugee camp squalor for yet another 60 years." Adler's office said he hopes the talk will help Canada find a role in resettling Arab refugees.

WORLD

New Jewish Mayor

FRANKFURT — The German city of Frankfurt has elected its first Jewish mayor since 1933 and only its second in history. Peter Feldmann, a 53-year-old economist and political scientist, won March 25 with 57 per cent of the vote, reportedly surprising even himself. The Social Democrat succeeds incumbent Petra Roth of the conservative Christian Democratic Union, who had called for early elections but didn't run. Frankfurt's first Jewish mayor was Ludwig Landmann who served from 1924 to 1933, when the Nazis came to power. At the time, the city had Germany's second-largest Jewish population, at 30,000. Today it has 7,000, mostly Russian Jews.

Reform Layoffs

NEW YORK — The Union for Reform Judaism laid off about 30 employees last week as part of a restructuring of the organization. The reorganization is part of a series of changes being ushered in by the URJ's new president, Rabbi Richard Jacobs, who took over at the start of January.

Shul Defaced

CHICAGO — The words "Jews murder" were sprayed painted on one of Chicago's oldest shuls. The graffiti was discovered the morning of March 28 on the Anshe Emet synagogue on the North Side. The congregation, which is nearly 140 years old, has been at its current location since 1929. It also houses the Bernard Zell Anshe Emet Day School.

Ex-Mayor Apologized to London Jews

Ken Livingstone

LONDON — Ken Livingstone, the former mayor of London seeking to reclaim his post, apologized for statements he made in a meeting with the city's Jewish community leaders.

The apology, in the form of a long letter from the Labour party member to the Jewish community, appeared in the Jewish Chronicle last week.

Headlined "Please, let's move on from the 'Ken and the Jews dramas,'" it said, in part, "If I believed that Jewish people won't vote Labour in this election, and I did not value the opinions and concerns of Jewish Londoners, I would not have spent my evening at that meeting."

Livingstone the previous evening had a lengthy meeting with Labour party leader Ed Miliband, who is Jewish, and the Jewish Leadership Council in which the apology, with its exact wording, was hammered out.

At a March 1 meeting with Jewish leaders, Livingstone said Jews would not vote for him because "the Jewish community is rich," and he used the words Zionist, Jewish and Israeli interchangeably and "in a pejorative manner," the leaders said in a letter to Miliband.

The meeting was held to discuss Livingstone's support of radical Muslim cleric Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi and his accepting money from Iranian state broadcaster Press TV. Livingstone has been a frequent critic of Israel.

Volunteers aid Habitat project

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Some 20 volunteers from various Conservative synagogues, in partnership with Habitat for Humanity, recently spent a day in east Toronto building housing for low-income families.

The 29-family multi-housing unit, at 4572 Kingston Rd., is scheduled for completion at the end of March, when it will be ready for the last 17 families to move in.

The day spent working on the construction site, March 25, was the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's (USCJ) first community mitzvah mission for 2012. The mission was supported by Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Beth David Synagogue, Shaar Shalom Synagogue and Beit Rayim Synagogue.

"My daughter, while attending Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto... got involved with Habitat for Humanity in Virginia. It was she who inspired the idea to start a USCJ mitzvah mission in Toronto," said Irv Siegel, sub-district chair of USCJ eastern Canada.

"By spending a day building the future for Toronto families living in need, USCJ will have a direct hand in building a better community. This was integral to our efforts to give back to the community and was a perfect fit," Siegel said.

Enloe Wilson, faith and community relations co-ordinator of Habitat for Humanity, said that 76,000 families are "currently in line for some form of social housing in Toronto. This is subsidized housing. We simply don't have the volume to accommodate that demand.

"A wait for a one-bedroom unit can take up to eight years for a family in need. We can't fix that situation all by ourselves, but we can be a part, and we are only a part by way of volunteers like USCJ."

Volunteers, who ranged in age from 16 to 70, were responsible for raising a minimum of $75 each, with a goal of $1,500, which many exceeded.

They were 10 cousins. The oldest was almost 13, the youngest almost four – eight boys, two girls. Somehow, they all seemed to fit at one end of a makeshift table that filled the entire length of the kitchen.

To a youngster seven years old, the kitchen seemed, like all kitchens, large enough to accommodate the 20 people who crowded around the table.

The Kelvinator fridge stood at one corner of the room, at the joining of the wall opposite the table perhaps 10 feet away, and the wall between the kitchen and the summer kitchen.

From the editor's desk...

In fact he never did understand why that smaller room attached to the kitchen was called a summer kitchen. No one ate there at any time, let alone in the summer. It was poorly lit, damp and cold, and used mainly as a gigantic storeroom in which cans of food and other household supplies were stacked in jumbled asymmetry on homemade shelves lined with wax paper.

One walked through the summer kitchen and down the four or five wooden steps to get into the backyard, a small postcard patch of concrete and grass, the escape route to the laneway behind the house, the paradise of all playgrounds for the 10 cousins and their many friends.

At the other end of the table and around its middle sat their parents and grandparents.

Grandfather sat at the head of the table. Although he was not a stern man, he had a stern bearing, probably as a result of his slow gait, his ramrod straight-backed posture and the way he spoke. Even though he was essentially deaf in one ear, he generally spoke quietly.

To a youngster of seven years old, grandfather was the embodiment of authority. No one challenged his will; no one countermanded his instructions; no one questioned his advice – certainly not any of the grandchildren.

Sitting beside grandfather, on his right, was his son, the seven-year-old's uncle. To grandfather's left sat one of the three sons-in-law, the seven-year-old's father.

The other aunts and uncles found their places around the table. Grandmother, two of her three daughters, her son and daughter-in-law sat on the side of the table closest to the fridge, the stove, the sink, the counter and the cupboards. The seven-year-old's mother sat beside her husband.

That night however, the cousins did not charge through the summer kitchen to get to their fantastical laneway. They spent the entire evening inside.

It was Pesach. The extended family had gathered at the bubbeh's and zydeh's house for the seder.

More than four decades later, when the seven-year-old was himself a parent, and he missed his own father, and he wanted to "see" again some of the images of his father as a young man, he recalled the smells and the sounds and the sights of the seders at his grandparents' home – a narrow, two-storey, semi-detached house in the "greener" immigrant neighbourhood of downtown Toronto in the 1950s.

How did we all fit into that kitchen? he wondered bemusedly. How did we not bump into each other whenever we tried to move? How did we have room even to bring the spoonfuls of chicken soup to our mouths without splashing the person next to us?

Though he carefully and lovingly peeled back more of the layers of his memory, he could not remember any scenes of bumping or splashing.

But the echo chambers of his memory did bring back to him the "noise" of the kitchen/dining room. It was always more than a din and never less than a commotion. Had there been a "noisometer" in the room, it would have surely been stuck between ruckus and hubbub.

How could it have been otherwise? At one end of the table were the 10 young cousins. At the other end of the table were the 10 adults: grandparents and parents.

Because grandfather was essentially deaf in one ear, the adults spoke to each other rather loudly, and because the adults spoke rather loudly, the cousins, simply to hear each other better, spoke even more loudly than their parents.

Adding colour to the volume of the sound was the cacophony of four different languages. The cousins spoke to each other in English; the adults spoke to each other in Yiddish. The adults spoke to their children in Yiddinglish. The children answered them in Engliddish.

But that was only during the meal part of the seder. During the narrative of the Exodus, there was only one language: the heavily Polish-accented pronunciation of the Hebrew and Aramaic of the Haggadah, and there was only one sound: the familiar, comforting, sweetly melancholy tenor voice of the seven-year-old's father leading the family in the recitation of the story.

The boy never asked why his father led the recitation and singing. It seemed only natural and right. His father, after all, was a marvellous singer. He had the finest voice of anyone in the family. He loved to sing. But more important, it was obvious even to the seven-year-old that his father needed to sing.

Many years passed before the seven-year-old was able to see the images of his young father in their truer dimension. He finally "saw" that his father, and other sole "survivors" like him, were also remembering and searching as they sang at the seder.

His father, too, was searching for images from a former time. But his memories, barely more than a decade old when his son was seven, could not comfort. They still cut him deeply, the dull edge of recollection's blade piercing his psyche and stabbing at his heart even as his sweet voice became part of the din and commotion of the seder in a new life in a new land.

Italian honoured as Righteous Gentile

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Giorgio Perlasca, an Italian businessman who posed as a Spanish diplomat while in Hungary during World War II, saved more than 5,000 Hungarian Jews.

He was honoured at a tribute attended by his son, Franco, and his daughter-in-law, Luciana Amadio, at the Lipa Green Centre in Toronto on April 1.

The event was organized by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and the National Council of Italian Canadians.

Giorgio Perlasca was born in Como, Italy. At the beginning of World War II, he was sent to Hungary to get supplies for the Italian army. In 1943, Italy signed an armistice with the Allied Armed Forces, who were then occupying the southern party of the country, entailing the capitulation of Italy. Perlasca refused to swear loyalty to Mussolini's Italian Social Republic, a puppet state of Nazi Germany, and instead proclaimed his loyalty to the Italian monarch, Victor Emmanuel.

Perlasca was jailed but eventually took advantage of a medical pass and sought refuge in the Spanish Embassy in Budapest. He became a Spanish citizen, going by the name of Jorge Perlasca, and he began working with the Spanish ambassador, Angel Sanz Briz, and other diplomats of neutral states to help Jews escape Nazi Hungary. He acquired protection cards for many Jewish citizens based on the 1924 Law of Miguel Primo de Rivera, which granted all Jews of Sephardi origin Spanish citizenship.

When Sanz Briz left Hungary for Switzerland in 1944, the Hungarian government ordered Perlasca to clear out all the houses where Jews were living, and were protected. Perlasca knew that these Jews would be sent to concentration camps, so he falsely informed the government that he had been appointed Sanz Briz's replacement. This allowed him to house, feed and protect more than 5,000 Hungarian Jews. After the war, Perlasca moved back to Italy and did not speak of his heroic actions until 30 years had passed.

Franco Perlasca spoke to the audience, made up of members of the Italian and Jewish communities of Toronto, about his father. "He left a beautiful legacy," Perlasca said. "Remembering is important because it shows that anybody can do something like this, if they want to. I hope his story is remembered, especially by young people, so that they know how to react to violence like this."

Perlasca never revealed to his wife or children that he played such a large role in saving the lives of so many Hungarian Jews. The story only came out when a few Hungarian women began looking for the Spanish diplomat who saved their lives.

"My father never told his story," said Perlasca. "When these women found him, I began to understand that he saved them. But when they started telling their stories, I realized that my father might have saved tens, hundreds or even thousands of people, and then I couldn't comprehend it anymore. I realized I had lived for more than 30 years with a person who I knew nothing about."

During the presentation, a film about Perlasca was screened, in which Mary Siklos, a Toronto Holocaust survivior, spoke about Giorgio Perlasca. "He saved my family," she said. "I would never have been born if not for [his] bravery."

Perlasca was often asked why he took such risks to save the lives of strangers. His son said his father would always answer, "What would you have done in my shoes, seeing so many people suffering and being killed just because of their religion."

Perlasca has been honoured by Israel, Italy, Hungary, Spain and the United States. He died in 1992 and asked that the phrase "Righteous Among the Nations" be written in Hebrew on his grave.

Len Rudner, CIJA's director of community relations and outreach, said he was delighted that the opportunity to honour Perlasca arose.

"I think it's tremendously important to reflect on the fact that one person can make a difference. It's an important lesson for us to hold close to our hearts," he said.

Items that appear in a typical Passover food box

Food drive falls short

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Karen Fenwick, co-chair of National Council of Jewish Women – Toronto section's Passover Food Drive, is appealing to the community for donations after the annual campaign failed to keep pace with last year's fundraising.

As of March 28, the drive had raised $25,000 less than it had by the same date in 2011, which could affect next year's campaign.

That's because the food drive had to make up for the shortfall by tapping into contingency funds it usually uses to start buying food in the summer for the following Passover, Fenwick said.

Karen Fenwick

Delivery day, March 25, was very successful, she said. "Volunteers came out to the deliver the food, and every recipient on the list received a box.

"We have to think long and hard about next year, though. We do not want to cut the recipient list, and we don't want to decrease the amount of food in the box, so we'll have to look at more efficient ways of running the drive."

The food drive is very important, Fenwick said, "especially for those who are struggling financially. We believe that all Jews should be able to celebrate Passover with dignity.

"I am sad and frightened, because the future of the drive is unsure. We can't go down $25,000 next year."

To inquire about donating funds, call NCJW Toronto section, 416-633-5100.

The volunteers arrived at the site at 8 a.m., completed the registration process, and received steel-toe boots and hard hats. They also received a safety training session and were led in the Habitat cheer, a Swahili saying, "Oyee," which means "We can do it," in English.

Volunteers also received a Habitat T-shirt. USCJ had added logos with the name of the kehillah, along with the USCJ and Habitat logos, to the shirts.

Volunteers were split into groups and led through projects by crew leaders, who are experienced construction volunteers.

Barry Levine, from Beth David Synagogue, had volunteered before on a similar project, and he wanted to introduce his 16-year-old son, Ben, to the work.

"Dad brought me out today. I am laying laminate flooring with the guidance of crew leader Roger LeFebrve, who has shown all the volunteers how to use power tools to get the job done," Ben said.

"I like the idea that I am helping those less fortunate and it's a good feeling."

Rabbi Irit Printz, of USCJ eastern Canada, said she worked with Humanity for Habitat when she was a rabbi in Atlanta. "When Irv Siegel suggested we do a project where the synagogues could participate, I thought it was an excellent idea. It really embodies what Judaism is all about which is fixing the world and making the world a better place.

"It worked very nicely with Passover, because part of what we are supposed to be doing between Purim and Passover is helping those who are less fortunate than us. At Purim we send gifts of food, and during Passover we are supposed to invite people into our home. We thought it would be nice if we could help these underprivileged families create their own home so the 'who' value of fixing the world fits in generally with our mission, tikkun olam," Rabbi Printz said.

Wilson said that "providing simple, decent, affordable housing remains a matter of social justice, and we are proud to champion a social justice model that essentially helps people help themselves."

We tell our children

It is not by accident that on seder night the narration of the story of the exodus from Egypt begins with our children. After the preliminary formal invocations of blessings, we commence the retelling of our forebears' harrowing yet epochal departure from the land of slavery in response to the Four Questions asked by one of the youngsters at the table.

Nor is it coincidental that the seder night festivity ends with the playful and often rousing singing of songs that are clearly written in the form of children's lyrics.

In his commentary on the Haggadah, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks emphasizes this very point. "Just as we began the seder with the questions of a child, so we conclude it with a nursery rhyme, reminding ourselves that what sustains a faith is not strength or power, but its ability to inspire successive generations of children to add their voices to our people's song."

Children ask questions. Parents and grandparents answer. That is the way of the seder. That is the way of the family. That is the way of our people and has been so ever since Abraham asked questions of God over the fate of Sodom.

The Haggadah teaches us that questions are always welcome, irrespective of their difficulty or, alternatively, of their utter simplicity, and that we must always respond to a question according to the nature of the child who poses it.

That, too, is the way of the seder.

The presence and participation of our children are indispensable to the very essence of the ritual and suggests its core purpose: to teach and to instruct – it is entirely didactic. We encourage our children to be curious, to delve, to explore, to enquire, to find pleasure in learning, and in the process perhaps too, in eventually discovering for themselves – one day if not on seder night – that they belong to something much larger than the family around the table.

And this realization is a source of profound emotion for the parents and grandparents at the seder. For in the faces and the behaviours of our children and grandchildren, we recall and see the faces of people whom we once loved and who were always so prominently at our seder tables past, but are no more.

"And you shall tell your children on that very day" (Exodus 13:8) was God's commandment to the recently freed Israelite slaves.

That is what we do at the seder. We tell our children, gently, tenderly, attentively, responsively, lovingly the story of the Exodus. It is their story too, even as it is the story of their ancestors.

The seder renews that story for each generation and helps create new memories for our children, forging those memories into the steadfast, unbreakable steel of shared responsibility, peoplehood and mission.

Prime Minister's Passover greetings

It is with great pleasure that I extend my warmest greetings to the Canadian Jewish community as you observe the festival of Passover.

Pesach commemorates the Exodus of the Children of Israel from slavery to freedom. It is a celebration of the power of courage and faith in overcoming oppression. Throughout history, this momentous event has been a source of hope and inspiration for the Jewish people.

Today, Canada is proud to have a strong and devoted Jewish community that continues to observe these centuries-old traditions. As you gather around the seder table and read the Haggadah, you may be heartened by the wonderful spiritual legacy you are preserving. Your adherence to your faith is truly admirable.

On behalf of the government of Canada, Laureen and I offer our heartfelt wishes for a happy and peaceful Pesach.

Premier's Passover greeting

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I am delighted to extend warm greetings to everyone celebrating the sacred festival of Passover. Today's world holds unlimited possibilities and unprecedented opportunities. As premier, I believe that learning history's lessons is key to overcoming our current global challenges – and to mapping out a prosperous, sustainable and harmonious future for the generations to come.

Passover is a remembrance of past struggles and a celebration of freedom. It is also an opportunity to pass on values and lessons that will help youth make their way in life. Through readings, prayers and stories, Jewish youth learn of their people's remarkable journey from oppression to emancipation. I wish to take this opportunity to commend the Jewish community for cultivating the ideals of hope, perseverance and justice in the hearts of all people.

May your Passover bring you many blessings, much wisdom and great joy, and be filled with the strength that is found in faith. Please accept my very best wishes for a happy and memorable Pesach. Chag Samayach!

Divestment campaign defeated

The article "Carleton grad students pass divestment motion" (March 29) failed to note that the plebiscite passed at the Graduate Students Association was a last-ditch effort by Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) to salvage its failed divestment campaign. This article should have mentioned that divestment from Israel was explicitly rejected twice in the past year, with the undergraduate students association and the board of governors – the body that actually has influence on such investment choices – both taking a stand against this campaign. These decisions resulted from the hard work of pro-Israel students – Jews and non-Jews.

The CJN's report, however, stated that 72 per cent of students voted for divestment from four companies that, although the resolution omitted this point, do business with Israel. In fact, 72 per cent of students who participated in the plebiscite voted for divestment – representing only 204 votes out of some 3,000 graduate students at Carleton University. Although the article later provides vote totals, it is important to note that this signifies an "endorsement" by less than seven per cent of all graduate students.

The plebiscite itself is nothing more than symbolic, given that the Graduate Students Association has no authority over Carleton's pension investments. When Carleton's board of governors rejected this initiative last year, it established an ethical investing policy. Carleton's administration affirmed that this vote will do nothing to change its ethical investment standards. The message is clear: Carleton will continue investing in companies that trade with Israel, because Israel represents an ethical investment decision.

A modern Passover story
— The life of a Jewish hero —

Special to The CJN

Stories of the heroes of our Jewish nation are heartwarming, eye opening, encouraging and sometimes even frightening. When we hear such stories, we salute those people – some of whom we have never met – for their courage and perseverance, but most of all for their commitment to Judaism and the Jewish People.

We define some of our heroes as today's brave men and women of the Israel Defence Forces, people who protected and continue to stand up for the Jewish nation, as well as those who experienced the horrors of dictators in the middle of last century, including those who perished but also those who survived. Hirsh was a survivor. But he was not considered a survivor of the Holocaust.

This is Hirsh's story, which was told to my children at a seder.

In 1913, Hirsh was born in the village of Kaydanovo, Belarus (White Russia). As Hirsh grew, his father, Reb Dovid, instilled in him the beauty of Yiddishkeit and gave him a Jewish religious education. Besides learning in yeshiva until his late teens, Hirsh attended public school until eighth grade. He always ran home to his father and to his rabbis and teachers to learn as much as he could from their stories and teachings.

Michael Zobin

Hirsh learned to read from the sefer Torah for his bar mitzvah, which was a small, quiet gathering, and continued to read from Torah until he passed away in 1979.

One can just imagine that times were not so easy for Hirsh's family in Russia in the late 1920s and early 1930s. Hirsh started working in a metal fabrication plant just after his 13th birthday.

After Stalin rose to power in Russia, any form of Jewish education and practice was illegal. On Feb. 26, 1938, a year after Hirsh was married, he was arrested for "being an active member of a counter-revolutionary national Jewish organization."

At his trial, the prosecution depicted Hirsh as "an enemy of the Communist party and of the Soviet power, who carried out anti-Soviet propaganda and made comments betraying the fatherland." Hirsh was sentenced to 10 years of hard labour in Siberia for one reason: he was Jewish. (If one thinks about it, this sentence actually saved Hirsh's life, as he was in Siberia until after the Holocaust.)

While serving his sentence, Hirsh learned that his wife had given birth to a daughter. Some years later, he also learned that his wife and daughter both perished in the Holocaust.

Hirsh was released from his Siberian prison on Feb. 6, 1948. He settled in the city of Kutaisi, Georgia, where he worked as a carpenter. Although Hirsh had served 10 years of hard labour in Siberia, he had continued to learn, teach and honour the Jewish tradition.

He then remarried.

He wed Necha Kronghaus.

On Aug. 19, 1949, their son, David, was born. But the nightmare did not end. Before David's first birthday, on June 29, 1950, Hirsh was again arrested for "participating in a counter-revolutionary national group and continuing to engage in anti-Soviet activities." This time the sentence was not 10 years of hard labour. Hirsh was sentenced to permanent exile in the Krasnoyarsk region of the Soviet Union.

Hirsh and his family arrive in Montreal from Russia. Hirsh is fourth from the right.

The kids stopped the story right there. "It's not fair!" they shouted.

Hirsh, Necha and David lived in the small village of Dolgi Moste among criminals who were sentenced for real crimes against people and property. But Hirsh treated all the labourers with respect and in return, he was saved multiple times from attacks by those very same men. While in Dolgi Moste, their daughter, Anna, was born.

After Stalin's death, the people who lived in urban centres in the Soviet Union were said to have cried tears of grief. But the political prisoners in exile danced in the streets. Hirsh prayed. On Sept. 13, 1954, Hirsh and his family were released from the Krasnoyarsk region. They settled in the city of Rostov. On Sept. 13, 1957, he received a full pardon. In Rostov, Hirsh became the chazzan, ba'al koreh (reader from the Torah), read the Megillah on Purim and sounded the shofar on the High Holidays.

Hirsh and the family applied for exit visas to Israel on several occasions. But all their requests were rejected.

Hirsh had a sister, Tzila, living in Montreal. Every Pesach, Tzila had sent Hirsh "care packages" to Rostov that contained matzot. In 1971, just before the High Holidays, Tzila advised Hirsh to apply for an exit visa to Canada.

Tzila was granted a meeting with an administrative assistant to prime minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau and asked if Trudeau would discuss Hirsh's exit visa application during his upcoming meeting, in October 1971, with the visiting Russian prime minister, Alexei Kosygin.

The Hirsh family's application for an exit visa to Canada was granted.

Jut before Pesach 1972, they arrived in Montreal.

Hirsh, Necha, David and Anna settled in the Snowdon/Cote Des Neiges area of Montreal and made their home on Plamondon Avenue. Hirsh became a chazzan sheini at a local shul.

In Montreal, he was able to see his children get married and was privileged to experience the nachat of three of his nine grandchildren growing up and leading a Jewish life. His fourth grandchild was born on the seventh day of Nissan, a week before Pesach, 1979, the same day that Hirsh passed away. His fifth grandchild was born about six weeks later. That fifth grandchild is my sister. I had the great merit and honour of meeting Hirsh, as Hirsh was my paternal grandfather.

Hirsh was a survivor. He was, is and always will be a Jewish hero, my hero. Hirsh lived his life setting an example for us all of how we should all be proud of being Jewish.

(The statements in the story regarding Hirsh's arrests and prosecutions were obtained by Necha's brother in Jerusalem, from archived files of the government of the former Soviet Union. The archives were opened and translated within the last 10 years.)

Michael Zobin lives in Montreal with his wife and three children and works for a customs brokerage firm. He grew up in Toronto.

The genius behind Tel Aviv's towers

In Tel Aviv on March 22, hundreds of Israelis gathered at Israel's Tel Aviv Exhibition-Gardens to honour the great Israeli-Canadian entrepreneur David Azrieli.

At 90 years young, David still dazzles, making his mark in business and philanthropy. The man who brought the indoor mall to Israel – and coined the term for it, kanyon – continues to initiate projects while setting new standards in charitable giving in Canada and Israel.

Gil Troy

David is of that extraordinary Holocaust generation that not only survived, not only thrived in the New World, but improved it. Born in Poland in 1922 as David Azrylewicz, he escaped into Russia, survived getting shot, and eventually took the land route into Palestine, aided by another legendary figure, Moshe Dayan. After studying at the Technion, he fought during the War of Independence, travelled abroad and arrived in Canada in 1954. While working as a melamed, a Hebrew-school teacher, he entered the wild world of real estate. One of those successful, hardworking, driven, visionary tycoons who makes it look easy – but outlasted many others who failed – he built an empire in Canada, the United States and Israel.

Along the way, David also built a beautiful family with his amazing wife, Stephanie, and four extraordinary children – my prejudice as a family friend shines through – while giving back as a community leader, heading the Canadian Zionist movement for many years. David has always proudly proclaimed himself a Zionist, embodying the Zionist values of self-reliance, forward-thinking and constructive action. An avid art collector, David is now applying his endless energy and broad vision to the world of charitable giving. News reports when the Azrieli Group in Israel went public estimated that he and his family may contribute one billion dollars to his foundation.

Successful philanthropy requires spending money intelligently, not just giving it generously. Two of the Azrieli Foundation's signature projects prove that the insight that made David Israel's Master Builder is now helping him to become the Jewish world's Great Strategic Giver. In 2001, he published his memoirs, with his co-author and daughter, Danna Azrieli, as One Step Ahead: David J. Azrieli (Azrylewicz): Memoirs, 1939-1950. The experience proved so meaningful for him and his family that he decided to help others produce quality memoirs, too. The Azrieli Foundation Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program now humanizes the Holocaust victims "one story at a time," allowing survivors without David's resources to share their legacy with their heirs.

Similar empathy and creativity is being used to fight the problem of high school dropouts in Israel. When briefed about the challenges of keeping kids in school, David asked the critical question – when do we lose them? He discovered that most high school dropouts are "born," if you will, in the frustrations of junior high. As a result, the Azrieli Institute for Educational Empowerment has created a network of community centres in Be'er Sheva and elsewhere that assist young, overwhelmingly poor learners early in the educational process, so they can feel good about themselves entering high school.

Beyond the headlines, I have had the pleasure of knowing David as a loving family man, a warm presence, a sophisticated analyst, a probing conversationalist. Sixteen and a half years ago, when I was far more familiar with his reputation as a tough businessman than with his gentle scholarly soul, my wife – who grew up with his daughters – and I introduced him to our oldest daughter, who was about four months old then. David zeroed in on her, engaged her with his delighted smile, whipped out a camera, snapped off a roll of pictures, popped the film out of camera and gave it to us. I had simply never seen a 74-year-old gush so much over a baby, nor had anyone simply handed me a roll of film like that before – in the pre-digital era, it was simply not done.

Whenever I drive into Tel Aviv, I am entranced by the three tall, sleek towers David built, which have become, surveys tell us, among Israel's most defining icons. I marvel at their modernity, at the pioneering spirit behind them, at the constructive, entrepreneurial Zionism they epitomize. And I cherish the private moments my family and I have shared with the genius behind the towers, a modern-day David demonstrating the same reach, ambition and joyous abandon for which that great ancient king was known.

What is your cause?

I am writing this column from Israel, three days before embarking upon what may be the craziest thing I've ever done: bike 250 kilometres uphill from Haifa to Jerusalem to raise money for the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism (IMPJ).

Raising money? That's not crazy at all. I do it all the time. Biking 250 kilometres over five days, mostly off road, mostly hilly, mostly in forecasted rain and fog, mostly with young rabbinic students in their 20s who are fit as a fiddle? Now that's crazy.

But it's not crazy to be passionate. We say someone is "crazy about you" or "crazy in love." We are "crazy about" a particular movie or our new car or our job or our kids. "Crazy about" is about passion.

This ride is about passion. Passion for social change in Israel, for which the IMPJ works tirelessly. Passion that there be a true religious choice for Israelis, no more black-and-white categories of religious/not religious or dati/chiloni. Passion for religious pluralism, so that every Jew in Israel can find a Jewish niche. Passion for egalitarianism. Passion for the freedom to choose and the ability to question, within the framework of Jewish culture. Passion for a renewed Zionism that holds true to the highest values it originally held. Passion for a Jewish society based on tzedek – righteousness – in which no Jew can claim superiority over another Jew, and no Jew can oppress a non-Jew under the banner of Torah.

Most Israelis and Diaspora Jews, too, for that matter, are under the utterly mistaken impression that there are only two ways to be Jewish in Israel: religious (picture here either Chassidim in their distinctive dress or modern Orthodox, beret-wearing women pushing strollers to some hip Jerusalem synagogue on Shabbat) or secular (picture an Israeli family going to the Tel Aviv beach on Yom Kippur for a picnic, carrying their hibachi grill).

In fact there are 34 thriving Reform synagogues in Israel and they offer Israelis the "middle ground," tradition that embraces modernity, egalitarianism, and a life of religious meaning without religious coercion. However, these movements receive little government support and even less "common knowledge" support.

I chose to Ride for Reform because not only do I want to put my money where my mouth is, I wanted to put my body where my passion is.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

Passion is defined as "boundless enthusiasm," and we mislabel it as being about sexuality. Passion is when you're so moved by your cause that you cannot think of anything else. You're so dedicated to your cause that no obstacle seems too big. You're so sure that a rainy, muddy hill climb through the devastated Carmel forest seems pleasurable.

Yes, I'm sure I'll stumble and even fall, and come home with many bruises, exhausted and sore. But passion is what gives life meaning. As Steve Pavlins wrote, "Passion and purpose go hand in hand. When you discover your purpose, you will normally find it's something you're tremendously passionate about."

We should all have passion for our families and our work. But do we have a passion for a cause bigger than ourselves? A cause that changes the world? It doesn't have to be a big cause. It can be helping one child learn to read. And it doesn't need to be a small cause, either. It can be building a school for 100 kids. The people I admire most all have the same two things in common: passion and purpose.

So what is your cause? What would you hold as so precious that you would go a thousand miles to do something for its sustenance?

Iraqi general challenged a brutal regime

Although Saddam Hussein is dead and buried, the fascination he continues to exert on Iraq is almost palpable. He was a brutal dictator who transformed Iraq into a model police state, a serial aggressor who invaded Iran and Kuwait, an anti-Zionist who bombarded Israel with a barrage of Scud missiles during the first Gulf War in 1991, and an Arab nationalist who sent pensions to the families of "martyred" Palestinian suicide bombers.

Having been such a disruptive force, he thrust Iraq into the vortex of Middle East politics and always elicited the interest of both journalists and scholars.

Wendell Steavenson's vivid account of Iraq during this repressive period, The Weight of a Mustard Seed: The Intimate Life of an Iraqi Family During Thirty Years of Tyranny (HarperCollins), lifts the veil off a dictatorship that brought this developing Arab nation to ruin and isolation.

A British writer, she builds her narrative around Kamel Sachet, one of Saddam's favourite generals, and thus offers a reader an insider's view of Iraq.

Steavenson spent five years on this project, and though she did not interview Sachet himself, she talked with his family, friends and enemies.

Sachet, whose formal name was Kamel Sachet Aziz al Janabi, was born in 1947, in a village 20 kilometres from Baghdad without electricity or an access road. His father, a poor farmer, was illiterate.

A policeman, he joined the army and its special forces to enhance his career. Volunteering for every possible course, he studied mountain warfare in Germany and learned Farsi in Iran. A thorough professional, he rose through the ranks and became an officer.

A hero during the 1980-1988 Iraq-Iran War, he was promoted to general and given the command of the Baghdad division of the Republican Guard, one of the pillars of the Baathist regime. After Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990, he was placed in charge of the Iraqi army in Kuwait City. He was then appointed governer of Maysan province.

In Saddam's firmament, he was a bright and shining star. And Saddam rewarded him handsomely for his competence and loyalty. Apart from a slew of medals for bravery, he was lavished with late-model European cars, cash and a fruit farm near the town of Hilla.

At a ceremony, Saddam voiced

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

extravagant praise for him. "Look at Gen. Sachet!" he is reported to have said. "The Iraqi soldier should be in every way like this! Look at how fit he is! Look at his courage! Look at his good manners! Kamel Sachet is a commander I treasure."

Sachet was certainly an important cog in Saddam's machinery of state, but he was also a straightforward person, a trait that Saddam did not appreciate. As a well-connected Iraqi official told Steavenson, "The truth is, in our culture, frankness is disrespect."

In accordance with this Iraqi tradition, none of Saddam's top generals bothered to dissuade him from launching a major incursion into Kuwait, which had incurred his wrath by proving recalcitrant in debt negotiations and increasing oil production to Iraq's disadvantage.

Not consulted for his opinion, Sachet was none too pleased by Saddam's decision, which plunged Iraq into a morass with dire consequences.

"This is mad," he told his wife. "He has created a disaster that will destroy us all."

Despite his misgivings, Sachet dutifully reported for duty in Iraqi-occupied Kuwait City. With the Iraqi army having been ousted from Kuwait by the United States and its allies, Sachet returned abjectly to his home in Baghdad. He was critical of Saddam, claiming that Iraq's ignominious retreat had been premature. "We could have held out six months!" his wife quoted him as saying.

Not long afterward, following a mutiny in the Iraq army, Sachet was relieved of his duties and forced into retirement. He drove his new Mercedes deep into the desert and burned his uniform. "Kuwait had washed any pride in it away," she says.

But in 1992, in a development that Steavenson strangely leaves unexplained, Saddam summoned Sachet to his palace and handed him the governorship of Maysan province. Ever the patriot, he carried out his first order with dispatch, executing two senior Baathist officials who had tried to assassinate an official in front of Saddam's children.

Yet Sachet was not a happy camper. He disagreed with Saddam's policy of draining the life-sustaining marshes of the rebellious Marsh Arabs. Such insolence could not be tolerated by the powers-that-be. In 1994, he was demoted and given the menial task of selling used government cars.

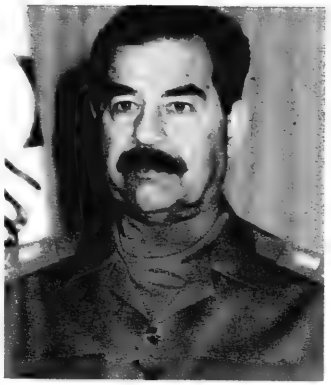
"By the mid-1990s, the net was closing," Steavenson writes. "The Sachets' phone was bugged – this they took for granted – and there was often a parked car outside with two men watching. When he rose early to drive to the mosque for dawn prayers, an agent on a bicycle followed him. The surveillance permeated the house and kept the family under protracted strain."

Steavenson describes this period as one of "fear, ever-thicker paranoia, dread and a constant unbroken tension."

Dr. Hassan al-Qadhani, an Iraqi psychiatrist, told Steavenson that the situation had become unbearable. As he put it, "You had to lie against your principles. You had to say things you did not believe. It was a mental conflict."

On Dec. 16, 1998, shortly before U.S. and British aircraft bombed Baghdad but soon after Saddam reorganized his general staff, Sachet was arrested.

Having investigated the circumstances surrounding his arrest, Steavenson thinks it was prompted by Sachet's refusal to serve under a general he despised and his lapse in failing to report the receipt of a letter from a former chief of staff who defected in the mid-1990s.



Saddam Hussein

Hauled into secret police headquarters, he was personally interrogated by Saddam, who slapped him across the face in raw fury.

By this juncture, Sachet was thoroughly disillusioned, Steavenson says. When his son, Ali, informed him that he wanted to study at the military academy and be a soldier, Sachet put down his foot, declaring that the army was no longer a good place for a young man.

In February 1999, Sachet's family learned to its horror that his body could be retrieved from Abu Ghraib prison.

He had been murdered.

A year later, Ali was detained at the Iraqi border on charges of trying to enter Jordan with a false passport. He was released in a general amnesty in 2002.

The Weight of a Mustard Seed is a harrowing cautionary tale about an Arab society emasculated and crippled by a murderous regime. Sachet's dismal fate goes a long way in explaining why Iraq's dictatorial neighbour, Syria, is in such utter turmoil today.

Israel: On brink of energy self-sufficiency?

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel could well become a net exporter of oil and gas in the near future, a forum on the Middle East was told last week.

The claim was made by an environmentalist and a former Canadian diplomat at a conference on "Canada and the New Middle East."

The daylong event at the Hyatt Regency Hotel was hosted by Advocates for Civil Liberties and The Atlantic Council of Canada.

Lawrence Solomon, founder and managing director of Energy Probe Research Foundation, said Israel has the third-largest reserves of oil shale in the world and intends to exploit them with the assistance of foreign investors.

Mike Ward, a retired diplomat whose last posting was in Istanbul, said immense oil and gas deposits in the eastern Mediterranean Sea stand to make Israel self-sufficient in energy.

Claiming Israel is sitting on oil shale fields that could yield from 250 billion to 500 billion barrels, Solomon said he expects Israeli exports to begin flowing within about a decade.

In his estimation, the price of each barrel would be about $40, far less than the present cost of gasoline.

Saying high-profile investors, including the Rothschilds, are involved in the quest to extract energy from Israel's oil shale reserves, Solomon noted Israel is a leader in the development of oil shale technology.

Ward observed oil and gas deposits in Israeli territorial waters are of such a magnitude that Israel cannot only become self-sufficient but a net exporter of energy.

Solomon said the United States is poised to overtake Russia as the world's number 1 producer of oil and gas.

He also warned the Arab Spring – the series of revolts that have broken out in the Arab world since the end of 2010 – has empowered Islamists.

"The Arab Spring has been an unmitigated disaster," he asserted in a blunt assessment.

Ward, who served as a senior trade commissioner in countries ranging from Turkey to Saudi Arabia, said many Canadian companies are seeking a presence in the Middle East. The primary focus of Canadian investors in the region today is Turkey, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Qatar, he said.

Lawrence Solomon

He added Canada is currently exploring the possibility of signing free trade agreements with Morocco and Turkey, the latter of which he described as one of the most western-oriented and stable countries in the Middle East.

Andrew Mahut, a representative of U.S. Steel Canada, said Canada – a major oil exporter – could benefit should Iran disrupt or stop oil tanker traffic in the Strait of Hormuz, through which 20 per cent of the world's oil supplies pass.

Raymond Boisvert, assistant director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), disclosed the Middle East has been the centrepiece of its work since the Arab terrorist attacks in the United States on Sept. 11, 2001.

The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is a threat to Canada and its allies, he declared.

Without specifically mentioning Canadian Muslims, Boisovert said CSIS is concerned by the threat of homegrown terrorism and by the influence of the "Al Qaeda narrative" on Canadian citizens.

Boisvert warned that foreign governments will continue to "target" new immigrants in Canada. Despite the death of Al Qaeda's spiritual leader, Osama bin Laden, Al Qaeda ideology is still very much alive, he said.

Iran continues to demonstrate "a clear intent" to develop nuclear weapons, he said, adding Iran's support of terrorism remains a concern.

Doug Best, an RCMP superintendent and head of its national security section, called terrorism "a critical threat to Canada," but he did not elaborate.

He said the RCMP's community outreach program has been successful in foiling terrorist plots. "We don't target communities," he said. "We target criminal activities."

In an allusion to recent events in Toulouse, France, in which a French Muslim of Algerian origin killed seven Jewish citizens and French soldiers, Best said the RCMP maintains an "appropriate" level of vigilance so that such outrages will not be committed in Canada.

As he put it, "We're flexible and can respond to a threat as it presents itself."

John Thompson, an international security expert affiliated with the Mackenzie Institute in Canada, suggested it is probably too late to destroy Iran's nuclear sites in conventional air attacks. He said the Muslim Brotherhood may attain power in Syria should the besieged regime of President Bashar Assad fall. "We don't know what Syria will become. Another Pakistan?"

Pakistan is both an ally and a foe in the battle against the Taliban in Afghanistan, he said.

In a bleak warning, he said the status of Christian Copts in Egypt may decline precipitously should the situation there deteriorate.

Baird delivers tough message

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird delivered a tough and uncompromising message about current developments in the Middle East last week.

Speaking via video to a Toronto conference on the region sponsored by Advocates for Civil Liberties and the Atlantic Council of Canada, Baird accused Mideast governments of repressing their citizens and warned of the spectre of a nuclear-armed Iran.

In a brief but wide-ranging speech, Baird described the Mideast as "critically important" to Canada and the world, saying it is rich in natural resources.

And in a reference to the Arab Spring, the chain of revolts that have toppled several governments in the Mideast since 2011, Baird declared Canada's national security interests are inextricably tied to these upheavals.

John Baird

Canada has a vital stake in Mideast issues, he added.

In a sharp critique of governance in the Mideast, Baird said some Arab governments neither respect human rights nor the rule of law.

"Basic rights and fundamental freedoms are denied in much of the Middle East," he said, calling current uprisings in the Arab world a quest for jobs, dignity and prosperity.

Baird said Canada is working for a safe and prosperous Middle East and for peace in the region.

In a condemnation of the Islamic fundamentalist government in Iran, Baird accused Tehran of ruling with a heavy hand and intimidating its people.

Referring to Iran's ambition for a nuclear arsenal, Baird said the Iranian regime should never have access to atomic weapons. In a clear warning, he said, "The threat of a nuclear armed Iran should not be underestimated."

The Guttman Family Science Wing

Opening at TanenbaumCHAT Wilmington Avenue Campus in September 2013

TanenbaumCHAT breaks ground this May for construction of The Guttman Family Science Wing, the first phase of the Together Campaign, a multi-million dollar endeavour.

The new wing will enable greater investigative, hands-on learning. With a strong emphasis on sustainability, featuring naturally lit spaces, local and recycled materials and energy efficient mechanical and electrical systems, our new wing will span nearly 16,000 sq.ft. of additional space and will include five new science labs, a science garden, greenhouse and courtyard.

"The new science wing will impact students' learning, not only in science, but throughout the school. The wing will foster a greater synergy among hundreds of students, staff, parents and the community," says Helen Fox, principal, Wallenberg Campus. "In these 21st century facilities, we will now have the possibilities for exploring curriculum to its depths with the most innovative space, equipment and technology."

Groundbreaking Event: Friday, May 11th, 2012 ... Hold the date!

Goodmans event a great success!

On March 6th over 50 business professionals working in the Bay Street area gathered at a Together Campaign fundraising event hosted by David Matlow and Stephen Bloom in the boardrooms of Goodmans LLP. An impressive $430,000 was raised from the room, with more discussions underway.

Every gift counts...count yourself in!

The Science Learner's Wall will provide permanent recognition for donors who give $5,000 to the Together Campaign, payable over five years. The Science Learner's Wall is an artistic rendering of the Periodic Table of Elements and features 118 recognition opportunities. Philanthropic support of the Together Campaign will ensure that current and future students have access to a state-of-the-art facility and innovative science programming.

$7.1 million raised to date, but much more is needed to reach our goal of $10 million!

Teen clarinettist wins shul musical award

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Lily Chapnik, 17, a clarinettist who is a student at the Schulich School of Music at McGill University, will be honoured with Temple Sinai's Ben Steinberg Musical Legacy Award.

The award presentation and the recital that follows are open to the public and will take place at Temple Sinai in Toronto on May 16.

Chapnik is one of the youngest recipients of the award. "Most winners are on the threshold of their career, usually well into their 20s, and ready to begin their professional careers," said Ben Steinberg, who the award was named after, when he retired as Temple Sinai's director of music after 26 years.

"Occasionally someone comes along who is much younger, like Lily. It's rare to see someone of that age play with such maturity."

Music runs in Chapnik's genes. Her grandmother, Atarah Ben-Tovim, is a renowned flautist. When Chapnik was eight years old, she went to France to visit her grandmother. "She took one look at me after I got off the plane and said, 'You're a clarinet player now,'" Chapnik recalled.

"She taught me rudimentary clarinet that summer and I loved it right away." She returned to Toronto and began clarinet studies with a private teacher, Igor Guletsky. She now studies with Michael Dumouchel, a member of the Montreal Symphony Orchestra. Her talent and dedication paid off. At the age of 12, she accompanied her grandmother to England to perform a concerto with the National Symphony Orchestra. She has also been a member of the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra and was admitted as the youngest member of the Toronto Youth Wind Orchestra at the age of 12. Her interests include chamber music and klezmer music.

Now she is pursuing a double degree in music and Judaic studies at McGill, while also playing in McGill's symphony orchestra. When she heard she won the Ben Steinberg award, she was ecstatic.

"I was really happy that it was a Jewish award because it bridges all my interests into one. It was really exciting because I will perform at my own recital as a prize, which is quite an undertaking and they really help you with it," she said.

Joining Chapnik at her recital will be her grandmother, who is presenting the award, and a flute quartet made up of Chapnik's professor and two other flute students.

The Ben Steinberg award was established in 1984 to encourage the careers of Jewish artists in the Toronto community and beyond, and to feature works of music by Jewish composers.

"There was a time when the Jewish community was much more represented in the musical industry," said Steinberg. He hoped this award would encourage Jewish children to pursue a career in music.

Many of the past winners have gone on to perform in major symphony orchestras in Montreal and Boston. "To win an award like this, you have to be pretty capable and talented," said Steinberg, who will work with Chapnik to prepare her for the recital.

Chapnik has used her talent to help others. In 2008 and 2009, she organized and performed in two recitals, which raised funds for music scholarships and for a Zimbabwe orphanage, through Advocates for Humanity.

For Chapnik, being a clarinet player is a chance to provide people with a unique musical experience.

"I love that once you really know the notes and you don't have to worry about messing up, you can focus on the music and on just delivering a musical message to your audience, taking them on a musical journey with you. That's what good performing is all about, in my opinion," she said.

Senior designs ultra-modern seder plate

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

For some people, retirement and a disability might mean the end of creativity – but not for Aubrey Abrams. Years ago, when the retired food manufacturer temporarily lost part of his vision, his family suggested he find a hobby where he could work with his hands.

He took courses in metalworking at Harbourfront, studying with metal artist and sculptor Shao-Pin Chu.

"I've always been technical," says Abrams, who practised law in Johannesburg, South Africa, before coming to Canada. With his newfound skills, he created jewelry and household items for family members in copper and other metals. He has since regained his sight, but a couple of years ago, he was seized with an urgent desire to use his skill with metal to create a bold, new seder plate design.

"When this overpowering inspiration comes over you, you've got to do something," Abrams says, and what he wanted was to create a seder plate different from any existing designs. "There were existing matzah holders on the market, round ones," but he didn't want to make anything like those that would be "run of the mill, copying somebody else."

That's when the concept for the ABALABE Seder Plate came together, a combined seder plate and matzah holder in sleek, brushed stainless steel. Not only "reminiscent of the pyramids of Egypt," the rounded triangular shape is "symbolic of the tears through the generations from Sinai… the destruction of the two Temples, the exile and the Holocaust, leading to the re-establishment of the Jewish homeland in Israel."

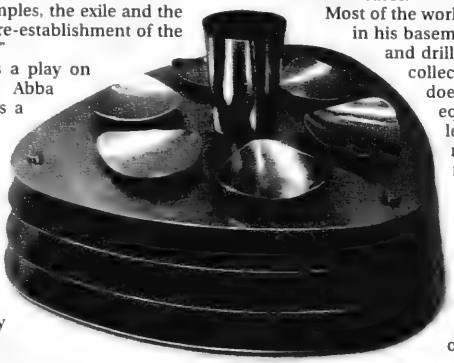
The name ABALABE is a play on Abrams' Hebrew name, Abba Leib. The set also features a separate co-ordinating triangular stainless steel cup for Elijah and six small removable dishes to hold the egg, shankbone and other ritual foods for the seder.

Though the plate, dishes and cup appear symmetrical at first, part of their appeal is that they are tapered, not perfectly regular. "They're wider at the bottom, narrower at the top," Abrams says. Practically speaking, that also means it's easy to insert the small dishes – they physically can't be placed the wrong way around. "They all look stunning, all facing towards the cup."

Creating the set was an elaborate process that began with design and modelling, first in Styrofoam and then in acrylic, before creating the first stainless steel edition.

"One day, I have to do one in silver," says Abrams, who has also created a brass chess set and original silver mezuzah cases.

Most of the work on the seder plates is done in his basement workshop, "using lathes and drills and all sorts of things I've collected over the years." But he doesn't have room for the laser equipment to cut the stainless steel – he buys the material and brings it elsewhere for the initial cutting. Then he assembles and polishes the sets himself. "I put a lot of effort into it, I'm quite proud of it."



The ABALABE Seder Plate by Toronto artist Aubrey Abrams

Abrams says he will make a maximum of 180 numbered, signed copies of the seder plate set. "There's a lot of work that goes into each one… there's a lot of work in polishing."

He is considering several Judaica designs for his next project, which he hopes will be something simpler and perhaps more affordable as a unique gift idea or special item for any Jewish home.

Seder plate on display at Petroff Gallery

"I've got a very wide interest in art and anything mechanical."

The biggest challenge Abrams says his art has faced is being away from home, travelling with his wife. They go to Israel every year and they have visited India, Australia, Italy and many other destinations.

"When you travel, you don't really do anything constructive. I like to be doing something, fixing something."

However, one advantage of travelling is the inspiration of seeing great art in galleries and museums around the world. "I'm looking for the masters, different ideas, how different artists function and what they develop."

But he says his wife has the better eye for design and colour. "She's the one who tells me my designs are good or bad."

Combining an entrepreneurial spirit with his newer talent and craftsmanship in sculpture has become even more meaningful through his exciting and modern Judaica items. Abrams says his family is very proud that his artistic impulses have taken him in this direction.

The seder plate is on display at the Petroff Gallery (416-782-1696) at 1016 Eglinton Ave. W. (just west of Bathurst).

Heschel gala gets positive results

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Last year, the Toronto Heschel School replaced its annual fundraising gala with a lower-key idea that organizers say not only brought in more money than its predecessor, but created a buzz and enhanced the school's sense of community.

Now in its second year, Table Talk consisted of 11 separate dinner parties in private homes, each with a guest speaker and a catered, kosher, gourmet, four-course dinner. Hosts donated the cost of the meals, and funds raised this year at the $150-a-plate event will be used for new science equipment for the school, which was founded in 1996 and runs from junior kindergarten to Grade 8.

"We wanted to reinvent the gala and think of something that would celebrate the community, be intimate, and would address the intellectual curiosity the parents share – and that would be fun," event co-chair Michelle Shulman said.

"The speaker stays for dinner, and conversation is great."

She said she has heard of similar fundraisers in the United States, but not locally.

Lainie Rapp, the mother of a senior kindergarten student, attended the March 25 dinner at the home of Lisa Richler and Yishai Wise, where author David Sax spoke about his book, Save the Deli: In Search of Perfect Pastrami, Crusty Rye, and the Heart of Jewish Delicatessen.

Rapp, a palliative care social worker whose husband, Gary Cilevitz, is an accountant, said the light-hearted topic was their number 1 choice, and that they looked forward to spending time with the hosts, whom they know from the school.

The menu, aside from the appetizers, did not feature deli food – much to Cilevitz's dismay, his wife noted. However, she said, the balsamic vinaigrette chicken that was served as a main course was "fantastic."

Some of the other dinners featured weightier presentations: Muslim author Tarek Fatah on his book The Jew is Not My Enemy, neuropsychiatrist Anthony Feinstein on "Journalists Under Fire," Rabbi Joe Kanofsky on Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel and Martin Luther King, Jr., and author Marina Nemat on her journey to Canada from Iran, where, as a teenager, she was imprisoned on false charges.

Matthew Teitelbaum, director and CEO of the Art Gallery of Ontario, speaks at one of the Table Talk dinners organized by the Toronto Heschel School as a fundraiser.

But Rapp said the talk about deli food, which included information about Jewish immigration from different countries and how those patterns influenced local deli trends, was "very stimulating."

As well, she enjoyed meeting people she wouldn't otherwise know. There were 13 at her table including parents of older children and one couple who have grandchildren at the school, she said.

Compared to large galas, "this is a much more intimate setting, and it really falls in sync with the whole Heschel philosophy of community building."

But the best thing, Rapp said, was the "buzz" at the school the next morning. "If you're talking about building community, this was the epitome. We were all running up and down the halls [asking] 'Where did you go?' 'How long did you stay?' "

The event "really reflects who we are as a community," Shulman said. "We're not a neighbourhood school. We're together because we share common values."

Founder promotes Krakow Jewish festival

David Grossman
Special to the CJN

Janusz Makuch admits he didn't know what to expect prior to speaking with two distinctly different Toronto Jewish audiences – and the personal discussions that would follow – on his first trip to Canada.

Bialik students Sofie Kreidstein and Daniel Esser watch as Janusz Makuch describes the program for the Krakow Jewish Culture Festival [David Grossman photo]

The 52-year-old was on a mission to talk about his role in restoring Jewish culture in Krakow, in a country that had once sentenced it to be forgotten.

Makuch, who is not Jewish, was hoping for an opportunity to educate people about what he had launched in 1988 while Poland was under a Communist regime.

As the founder and director of the Krakow Jewish Culture Festival, the largest of its kind in Europe with a week of concerts and celebration, workshops and exhibits, Makuch made it clear he wasn't asking for financial support for an event that has a $1-million (US) annual budget.

"I come from a country of ghettos, German concentration camps and antisemitic madness," Makuch, a musician, told a predominantly adult crowd at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. "I was in my late 20s, wanting to discover the traces of the past, the vast richness of culture in Krakow and had this crazy idea – let's organize a Jewish festival. But I was afraid no one would come."

He was wrong.

For the past 22 years, thousands – the young and not so young – have jammed Krakow's historic Jewish district of Kazimierz in June and July for 10 days to celebrate the beauty of Jewish culture.

A guest of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada and the Ashkenaz Foundation, Makuch caught the attention of grade 7 and 8 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School the next day with his reference to the event as being what some had referred to as the "Jewish Woodstock."

Claiming there is "a boom of Polish Jewish heritage and interest from lots of non-Jews," Makuch said reviving Jewish music, art, dance and singing has very special meaning to him. "We will never forget that Poland is the largest Jewish cemetery in the world," he said.

"What we're doing is a festival that looks beyond the trauma. It's about life and reflects thousands of years of history, but also concentrates on today. We move forward building on the wonderful contemporary Jewish music – the cantorial and the Sephardic, the chassidic guys and the punk rockers, dancing and performing in an ambiance that inspires the culture."

This year's Krakow Jewish Culture Festival, with Jewish performers invited by the organizers, will feature between 150 and 180 artists and take place from June 29 to July 8. Makuch said the event aims to educate non-Jews by highlighting the richness of life and the knowledge of religion.

"I have heard people ask how we can do something like this when not far away we had death camps," he said. "How much can we focus on what we have lost? With our youth, we now celebrate Jewish culture and study song, dance and bring Jewish life back to a country that almost saw it disappear."

Eric Stein, the 38-year-old artistic director of Toronto's Ashkenaz Festival, attended the Krakow event in 1999 and eight years later was invited to perform there.

"I first went as a spectator with an open mind," said Stein, an accomplished musician. "Then, when we performed, it had to be one of the most amazing experiences for me."

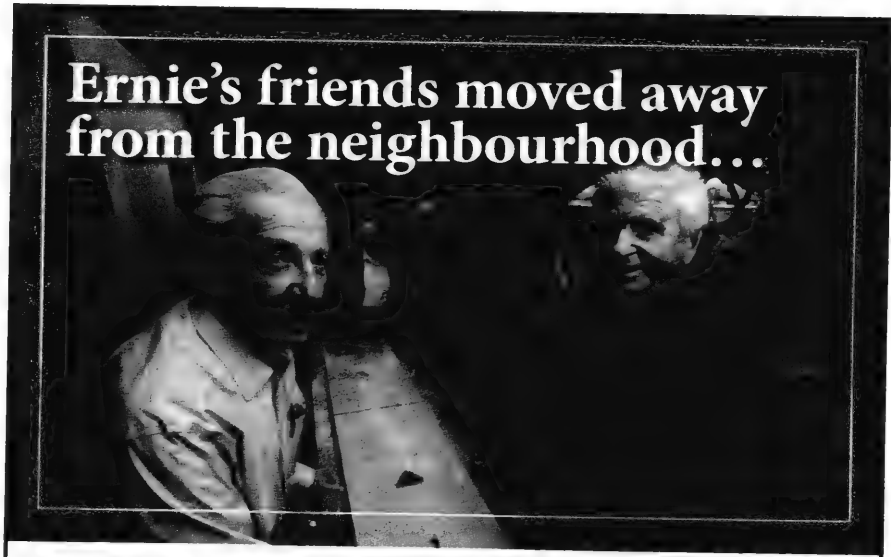
And when Makuch addressed the Bialik group of about 100 students and staff, more than one listener had a keen interest in more than just the topic.

Bialik students Daniel Esser, who plays the cello, and Sofie Kreidstein, a singer, were both impressed that the event was spearheaded by a non-Jew.

"Not being Jewish and doing something like this impresses me," said the 13-year-old Esser. "I was happy that he didn't dwell on the unfortunate things of the past and instead was glad to hear him admit that Jewish culture has been part of Poland culture for many years."

Kreidstein, 12, had a similar reaction.

"We know that terrible things happened, but it's time to move forward," she said. "Having something like this helps us learn. Then, to have someone not Jewish say he understood how the Jewish culture was an important part of Poland. We have to build on that message."



At Chartwell, they're just down the hall

There was a time when Ernie knew everyone in the neighbourhood. Running into friends was as easy as taking a morning walk or watering the grass in the early evening. But as the years passed, the neighbourhood began to change. Over time, Ernie's friends began moving away and life became lonelier.

Now at Chartwell, Ernie is part of an active community again. Not only is he making new friends, but he is back to doing the things he's always enjoyed: a morning coffee with the gang, a game of afternoon cards and shooting pool after dinner. Like your friends just down the hall? We can help.

Pesach lessons all year long

The holiday of Pesach is a stand-alone Jewish holiday. In other words, we keep it in isolation from the rest of the year.

Unlike Rosh Hashanah, for example, the themes of Pesach don't often continue to inform us beyond the holiday. I don't eat matzah any other time, nor am I dipping vegetables into bitter herbs or concocting food that looks like clay mortar.

Feelings of redemption are hoped for throughout the year, but I'm not told to re-experience Egypt and the redemption from it every time I sit down to eat.

Most of the other Jewish holidays inform me in a way that will continue to bring me Jewish connection throughout the year. Sukkot is the time the world is judged for water amounts, so if I encounter a dry season or a flood, I can connect back to Sukkot. Chanukah always reminds me of Jewish pride and autonomy, while Purim teaches me of the precarious position of Jews in exile.

Yet somehow I manage to isolate Pesach and experience Pesach immersion for one week, and when I pack up the Pesach dishes, I also pack up the Pesach meaning.

But this is an artificial disconnect. The meanings of Pesach aren't meant to be isolated from the rest of my life. I should be identifying "Pesach moments" the rest of the year and reinvigorating the meaning of the holiday.

One of the major themes of Pesach is the idea of seizing the opportunity. Miriam teaches us this meaning most effectively when she watches over her baby brother, Moses, and seizes the opportunity to bring mother and son together by suggesting she bring a Hebrew nursemaid for the baby.

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

Moses seizes the opportunity to save an innocent slave when he defends him from an Egyptian taskmaster, even to the point of death. There are many more examples that we could ask our guests to identify during the seder. The next step of course would be to re-examine moments in our lives when we seized an opportunity that ended well or not so well.

Another main theme is one of redemption, a word many of us don't quite understand. When we redeem an article, we retrieve something that was once ours but has been kept away from us. Likewise, redeeming ourselves is to identify what part of our true selves have we been burying inside, away from the access that we need to retrieve back into our lives.

Of course, one of the things that matzah signifies is our commitment to end suffering. The Torah tells us that as long as we remain in Egypt, the plagues will continue. Once we're told to leave, we grab our bread, not yet leavened, and we rush out. The matzah symbolizes how quickly we left, since the sooner we leave, the sooner the last plague stops.

The sages in the midrash have noted that we are told to "observe the feast of the matzot" just as we are commanded to "observe the mitzvot." The Hebrew letters of both "matzot" and "mitzvot" are identical, and from this we learn that just as we can't be slow in baking our matzah or it will leaven, so we must not be slow in seizing the opportunity to do a commandment. The themes of Pesach are brought together and made meaningful to the other 51 weeks of our year.

The stressfulness of Pesach can tempt us to create an isolationist attitude toward the holiday. Ironically, we would then miss the opportunity to seize the moment and teach ourselves to hurry toward acts of loving kindness and ultimate redemption.

Why would we want to do that?

Rachael Turkienicz is director of rachaelscentre.org.

Everyone is Welcome

Israel and the Persian Empire

We recently celebrated the holiday of Purim, which is based on events that occurred during the mighty Persian Empire of the middle of the first millennium BCE. Today, we face the descendants of the Persians, the modern state of Iran, whose stated goal is once again the destruction of the people of Israel. Despite the picture painted in Esther's Megillah, 2,500 years ago relations with the Persians were somewhat different than they are today.

The founder of the Persian Empire, Cyrus the Great, has been looked upon favourably in the long span of Jewish history. It was Cyrus who allowed the exiles to return from Babylon after the 70-year captivity following the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerusalem and the First Temple.

The time spent in Babylon was a crucible in Jewish history. Contrary to popular belief, not all of the population of Judah was deported to Babylon. It was primarily the leadership and intelligentsia that were carried off to captivity "by the waters of Babylon." This period saw the gathering together of our sacred texts. It also laid the groundwork for the meeting house, or beit knesset, which the Greeks would call the synagogue.

These institutions were developed to allow the survival of our people in exile. It was not the first time that such a catastrophe had befallen us. That had also happened about 125 years earlier, when the Assyrians destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel and deported thousands of its inhabitants, giving rise to the legend of the Ten Lost Tribes. These tribes never came back, while many of the exiles from Babylon did.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

Interestingly, the Persian period, which lasted for 200 years, is one of the least understood phases in the history of ancient Israel. One of the best-known authorities of this age is Prof. Ephraim Stern of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who has written the definitive text on the Persian era in Israel. Some of his evidence comes from the site of Tel Dor, the magnificent ruin on the Mediterranean coast of Israel north of Caesarea, which he excavated for over two decades.

Although the Persian age has very few monumental remains, such as those from the Roman period or the preceding monarchical age, it was a peaceful time in which we were governed with minimal outside interference. This is in marked contrast to the succeeding Hellenistic Age, when we fell under the sway of the successor states of the empire of Alexander the Great.

The period of Persian rule in Israel allowed us to return from exile. Under Nehemiah, the Persians gave us permission to rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem, albeit on a much smaller scale than the one before or the one that came after, built by Herod. Also, during the period of Persian rule, we nearly completed the canon of our holy text under Ezra the Scribe, thus laying the groundwork for our survival as a people in the tumultuous ages to come.

Looking forward

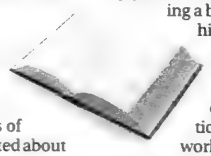
Rabbi Howard Markose

I have had an experience of a lifetime returning to Toronto after being away for the past 17 years. Following a decade as a rabbi in Toronto from 1984 to 1994, I made aliyah to Israel with my family in hopes of realizing our Zionist dream.

Judy and I found a home and a community in the southeastern part of Jerusalem, called Armon Hanatziv, and there we have raised our four children. We have said in our retelling of our "why we made aliyah" story that we didn't actually abandon Toronto, but rather as a result of our move to Israel, we had to leave somewhere, and our having chosen to settle in Jerusalem was a great decision, which we affirm every single day.

We are about to celebrate the Festival of Unleavened Bread, which commemorates the liberation of the Israelites from bondage in Egypt. At the time of the Exodus, the children of Israel were running from persecution in Egypt. They were leaving their lives of slavery, and it didn't really matter where they were going. The Torah tells us that they left in a hurry – to get out and not to get to. Their destination, virtually unknown to them, seemed almost an afterthought. That the Israelite nation ended up in the Promised Land 40 years later and not right away perhaps was a result of the fact that they needed time to get excited about the prospects of being a free nation in their own land, one flowing with milk and honey. They needed to somehow look forward and anticipate with excitement what would be their future home.

Rabbinic Reflections



There are many aspects of our lives that we can be excited about and look forward to, a phenomenon that is well known in our Jewish tradition. Our midrash teaches that when the Israelites left Egypt, they were told that 50 days later they would receive the Torah, so they started counting the days – literally – looking forward to that great moment in their history. This counting became and continues to be the practice observed by subsequent generations of traditional Jews.

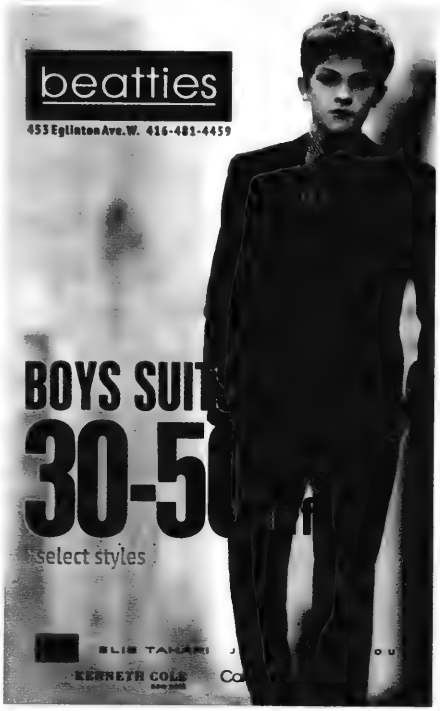
With this in mind, I challenge us all to look forward by creating goals for which we can reach, instead of marking situations we wish to avoid.

Our vacations, for example, can be planned as a "going to" experience rather than as a "getaway." It is hoped that the time spent on holiday is for investing quality time with family and friends and encountering new and different experiences rather than simply for "clearing the head" and "taking a break." Graduation from high school or university might best be seen as a stepping stone on the way to the next academic challenge or the ticket to the vocational world, rather than a goodbye to a past experience.

The exodus from Egypt gave the Jewish nation the freedom to look ahead to the receiving of the Torah. May we always possess an outlook in life in which are looking forward in positive anticipation.

Chag Samayach!

Rabbi Howard Markose is the interim senior rabbi of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.



Apps to help you keep kosher

As the days count down toward Passover, kashrut organizations are working overtime answering consumer questions and monitoring food manufacturers to make sure their products conform to halachic regulations. In addition to putting out glossy magazines and building informative websites, many kashrut organizations are also creating apps to cater to mobile shoppers, apps that will continue to help kosher consumers well after all the Passover dishes have been stored away for another year.

All apps are for iPhone/iPad and are free unless otherwise noted.

cRc Kosher: I love this app from the Chicago Rabbinical Council for several reasons. In addition to comprehensive product information, it includes:

• the definitive list of kosher liquor including bourbon, liqueur, mead, sake and vermouth.

• a Passover guide that answers questions about cleaning your home and which types of products require – and don't require – holiday certification.

• and a huge database of the logos of reputable kashrut agencies from around the world. If you see a squiggle on a product you can't decipher, just fire up the app and compare. [http://bit.ly/koshapp1]

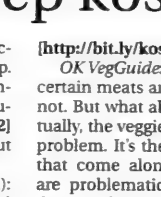
MK Kosher (iPhone and Android): "Your Key to a Kosher Canada" has a massive database of products, including gluten-free foods, vitamins, couscous and, fittingly for a Quebec-based organization, maple syrup. Also includes a handy listing of Montreal area restaurants under its supervision. [http://bit.ly/koshapp2] Check out a recent CJN article about this app. [http://bit.ly/koshapp3]

OU Kosher (iPhone and Android): Billed as the "world's most recognized trusted kosher certification," this app from the Orthodox Union includes a database of kosher products, kosher product alerts and a listing of newly certified products. [http://bit.ly/koshapp4]

Kof-K: Includes an interesting Q&A section. Sample question: how is it possible to have a certified kosher pareve product that states on the label "made on shared equipment with milk, nuts, shellfish.?" Answer: "It has become common practice for companies to post allergy information below the nutritional facts... Often a pareve product can be produced on equipment used for dairy production, after complete kasherization. Although the machinery is halachically considered 100 per cent pareve, a person with a severe milk allergy can conceivably have an allergic reaction." [http://bit.ly/koshapp5]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz



OK VegGuide: It's no surprise that certain meats are kosher and others not. But what about vegetables? Actually, the veggies themselves are no problem. It's the (non-kosher) bugs that come along for the ride that are problematic. This app surveys dozens of common vegetables from artichokes to zucchini and tells you which insects may be hiding out and what to do about them. [http://bit.ly/koshapp6] Also check out the OK Kosher Food Guide. [http://bit.ly/koshapp7]

Kosher or Not ($0.99): Some apps try to do almost any function you can think of. Others are determined to focus on one goal only. I would say that the Kosher or Not app falls into the latter category. Type in the name of a fish (or just the first letter), and you are presented with a long list of fish, some kosher, some not. With this app in hand, never again will you have to walk away from your local fishmonger wondering whether you can feast on Jewfish, Mozambique mouthbrooder or even porkfish, while remaining faithful to your heritage. You can. [http://bit.ly/koshapp8]

Passover preparation

Abigail Ben-Bassat, left, and Gabrielle Fisher, senior kindergarten students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre on Neptune Drive, press grapes to make wine for Passover.

Noam, a senior kindergarten student at Netivot HaTorah Day School, visited the Chabad's Model Matza Bakery with his class and "weighed in" on how to bake matzah.

Reena in the News

Reena

Grandparents Say Thank You to Reena

Our grandson Levi lives in a Reena home because of his special needs. He requires and receives the best of care by staff that is well trained and empathetic.

We often ask ourselves what our family would have done had Reena not been there for us. Levi was raised in a home where Jewish religious customs and practices are observed. From early childhood, Levi eagerly participated in Jewish religious life at home. At Sabbath meals Levi joined in the ritual and the singing, even leading the singing. At Passover, he would advise us on the proper order of the seder. It was always clear to us that Jewish religious practice had to be part of Levi's environment, not just because the family wanted it but because he wanted and needed it.

Over the years we have seen others with special needs who share Levi's craving for an outlet for their strong Jewish identity. We have no doubt that parents and grandparents of other faiths with special needs children could attest to a similar experience.

We realize that Reena cannot duplicate the full range of Jewish practices one finds in a religious Jewish home. However the Reena staff, acting in accordance with Reena policy, do their best to create a Jewish environment. Reena homes have mezzuzahs on the doors, the food is kosher, and Jewish holidays are celebrated.

Does Reena's attention to Jewish custom have an adverse effect on non-Jewish clients? We have been sensitive to this question and are not aware of any significant problems for non-Jewish clients. Of course no one attempts to proselytize others. Often other Reena clients seem interested in what is going on and enjoy the treats associated with the various Jewish holidays. When Levi asked to be taken to synagogue on Saturday mornings a staff member volunteered to take him. For a while two other clients asked to accompany him, one Jewish and one not Jewish. They enjoyed the novel experience and they and the staff member were happy to partake of the food served at kiddush (ritual blessing over wine) after services.

For Jewish clients like Levi, for whom a Jewish environment is important Reena is the only residential option available. Moreover we have been most impressed that all staff members, from top down, are attentive to the clients and their needs, and are willing to go the extra mile.

We are grateful to the late Rabbi Joseph Kelman of blessed memory who saw that it was possible to create a high quality organization serving all members of the Canadian population, while at the same time providing Jewish clients with a Jewish framework. We are grateful to Sandy Keshen, President, the Reena Board, and the Reena staff for so ably carrying out Rabbi Kelman's vision.

With thanks from grateful grandparents,
Arthur and Betty Kruger

Ethnic coalition deplores kosher, halal criticism

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A coalition of various community groups is calling on Parti Québécois (PQ) leader Pauline Marois to distance herself from her agriculture critic's comments on religious ritual slaughter.

Headed by Montreal city councillor Marvin Rotrand, the coalition's 11 members are mainly from outside the Jewish and Muslim communities.

They include Dan Philip, president of the Black Coalition of Quebec; Noel Alexander, president of the Montreal Jamaican Association; Aurora Osdon, president of the Philippine Association of Montreal, and lawyer Walter Chi-Yan Tom, as well as Salam Elmenyawi, spokesperson for the Muslim Council of Montreal.

Elected officials besides Rotrand, who is the majority house leader at city council and longtime councillor for Snowdon, are Montreal city councillors Frantz Benjamin; Côte St. Luc councillor Dida Berku; and Ellie Israel, a commissioner of the English Montreal School Board.

Rotrand, who is Jewish, said the endorsement by such a wide spectrum demonstrates "that you don't have to be Jewish to believe Jews should have kosher meat, or Muslim that Muslims should have halal meat."

All minorities feel threatened when one is targeted, he said.

The statement deplores André Simard's comments last month about the humaneness of halal and kosher slaughter and the safety of such meat, and especially his opinion that the practice clashes with "Quebec values."

Simard, a veterinarian representing Kamouraska-Témiscouata in the lower St. Lawrence region, raised similar questions again March 23, expressing concern that Quebecers may be unwittingly buying such meat because it is not properly labelled.

The coalition believes Simard's remarks are "evidence of the worst ignorance and of intolerance, two values that do not define Quebecers."

It believes Marois should rebut and dissociate herself from Simard's position, which the coalition says "tarnishes Quebec's image on the international scene."

Marois has not responded to the coalition, Rotrand said March 28.

Marvin Rotrand

The coalition points out that halal and kosher killing meets all of the federal standards for any type of slaughter.

Halal and kosher meat is generally sold in small stores frequented mainly by the Muslim and Jewish communities, it adds, and the meat that is sold in larger outlets is clearly labelled as halal or kosher.

The coalition is inviting the public to consult the abundant information available on the Internet about halal and kosher food. The members are convinced this slaughter is humane and that the meat is healthful. In fact, they claim many people with allergies to other meat can eat meat produced by traditional Muslim and Jewish practices.

Rotrand said he deplores what he sees as an effort to "demonize minorities," possibly for political gain by playing on Quebecers' insecurity about their identity.

All minorities, not just Muslims and Jews, feel the sting of any attempt to "drive a wedge between them and the majority, he said.

"I'm shocked because the PQ has always represented itself as progressive. This has generally been the discourse of the far right," said Rotrand. "We're disappointed Marois has been silent on the issue so far."

Simard, who has worked as a provincial inspector in abattoirs, said March 23 that he does not want to fan any anti-religious feeling.

"Religious ritual slaughter, whether it is kosher or halal, is an exception to the law, not the general rule," he reiterated.

A call to Marois' office for comment was unreturned by The CJN's deadline.

Vancouver federation campaign raises $7.6M

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Despite prevailing economic uncertainty, Vancouver's local Jewish community rallied together and raised $7.6 million through the 2011 Federation Annual Campaign.

An additional $585,000 was donated in supplemental gifts to fund specific programs.

The total amount raised is down two per cent from 2010, but the drop won't affect the distribution of funds to community needs locally, overseas and Israel, according to Mark James, annual campaign chair.

"We put risk management steps in place that would allow us to smooth out these bumps in the road," he said, referring to the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's (JFGV) agency stabilization fund that was created in 2008 to maintain allocations in down years and protect the community from swings in campaign results.

When the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) withdraws $91,000 from the fund, it will be the first time it's been tapped to maintain overall local allocations. Replenishing the fund is a priority for the 2012 campaign, said Mitchell Gropper, JFGV board chair.

Local needs include social services for socially isolated and frail seniors, supporting working families who have been affected by the economy, programming to support youth and encourage them to make healthy choices, and services to support Jewish adults with mental health issues. Sixty per cent of the funds raised will stay in the local community, while the remaining 40 per cent will be sent to Israel and programs overseas.

In addition to the $7.6 million generated through the JFGVs annual campaign, the Jewish Community Foundation, the endowment arm of the JFGV, distributed a total of $628,600 for the fiscal year ending March 31 to community agencies and received additional gifts totalling $450,000.

Ex-pat Iranian says most Iranians want peace

Tensions with Egypt fan Gaza fuel follies

A serious strain in Egypt-Gaza relations, although given scant media attention here, is very revealing about the strange complexity of developments in the region.

The story revolves around a severe fuel shortage in Gaza caused by Egypt and Hamas – and not Israel.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Contrary to what one might expect following the "Arab Spring" and the resulting rise of the Muslim Brotherhood, Egyptian authorities have in recent months refused to allow inexpensive gas to be smuggled through tunnels into the Hamas-run enclave. As reported by Associated Press (AP), the 1.5 million people of Gaza have thus suffered repeated, lengthy blackouts – including some lasting upwards of 18 hours per day. The fuel shortage has extended beyond motor vehicles, even affecting backup generators in hospitals.

According to AP, "[t]he fuel crisis has its origins in the decision by Hamas, more than a year ago, to use smuggled fuel to run the territory's only power plant instead of paying for more expensive fuel coming through an Israeli cargo crossing. The plant normally provides 60 per cent of Gaza's electricity." The power plant in question has been mostly down since mid-February.

After the fall of Mubarak, while Cairo has allowed Gazans greater access to Egypt through the Rafah border, it has refused Hamas' desire to use the crossing as a cargo route.

What angered Egyptian authorities was that while Egyptians, facing an economic crisis, were experiencing fuel restrictions, Hamas raked in profits via its standard cut from smuggled Egyptian fuel. At the same time, Hamas wanted to avoid paying back the Palestinian Authority for more expensive fuel that was previously imported into Gaza from Israel.

When Cairo cut off the supply of cheaper fuel to Gaza, a senior Hamas official accused Egypt of "political blackmail" and called on the newly elected fundamentalist-dominated parliament to "solve this problem."

Still, it was Israel that transferred half-a-million litres of diesel fuel to Gaza on March 23, paid for by the EU-backed PA, enabling the territory's power plant to operate at full capacity for the first time since the crisis began.

The deeper issue at play here is threefold:

First, Egypt doesn't want to assume responsibility for Gaza, and, therefore, insists that the onus still falls on Israel to supply goods and services to the territory.

Ismail Haniyeh

Second, although Israel would love for Egypt to take over full responsibility for Gaza, it's not going to press the issue at this time, given the tense and tenuous nature of the current relationship.

Third, Egypt has its own concerns about Hamas, given divisions within the organization itself, including those within Gaza who are trying to maintain ties with Iran. Ismail Haniyeh, Hamas' Gaza-based prime minister, visited Iran in March, reportedly seeking fuel subsidies, among other financial aid.

To thwart signs that Gazans might go on "strike" to protest Hamas' failed management, the organization's security services arrested more than 100 local residents last month, including taxi drivers, for spreading "rumours" of a fuel and electricity crisis in the strip.

Meanwhile, the Egyptian military, still in control of the country against the will of the Brotherhood, has offered some limited assistance to Israel in a bid to counter efforts by Hamas, Islamic Jihad, and other Iranian-backed terror groups that have used the Sinai as a platform for attacks. (On March 9, Israel killed Zuhir al-Qaisi, head of the Popular Resistance Committees in Gaza, who Israeli intelligence revealed had been planning another such terror operation.)

While Hamas is counting on the Egyptian Brotherhood to come to its aid, it's still the generals who are making the decisions, at least for now. In fact, the military may have struck a deal with the Islamists to retain major elements of control even after the June presidential election, the writing of a new constitution, and the formation of a new government.

What this means for Israel remains to be seen, but observers would be remiss to ignore the complex and shifting Egypt-Gaza relationship, and how it will shape the future of the region.

Neo-Nazi-turned-Jew describes his transformation

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Pawel Bromson needed to down the shot of whisky Rabbi Yossi Shanowitz brought him before he could overcome his nerves and begin to speak.

In his youth, Bromson was a neo-Nazi skinhead in Poland. He hated minorities and foreigners, and Jews – although he didn't know any – were especially loathsome to him. Bromson, 37, is today a black hat-wearing Orthodox Jew, working as a shochet and mashgiach in Warsaw.

He was in North America for the first time last week to speak about his remarkable transformation, through an interpreter, at a fundraiser for Chabad of Westmount.

His gang sometimes went to Auschwitz, vandalizing the site and shouting at visitors that the Nazis had not killed enough Jews.

Then, one day when he was in his early 20s, he learned that he was Jewish, that all four of his grandparents were Jewish, a fact that had been completely hidden.

Alcohol was his initial way of dealing with the staggering news.

When his wife came home 15 years ago with the documentary proof of his Jewishness, Bromson said he took a week off work and spent the first four days drinking.

"It was almost the end of the world for me," he said.

Bromson appeared overwhelmed by the crowd that turned out to hear him.

He was visibly uncomfortable talking about his skinhead days, which he wants to put far behind him and declined to go into details "about the horrible things I did." More than once he put his head in his hands to express his shame.

He said he grew up in a very patriotic family – his grandparents had been officers in the army.

His explanation – but not justification for his falling in with a racist "subculture" – was the turmoil that ensued after the fall of communism in the early 1990s, which coincided with his own rebellious adolescence.

Pawel Bromson

He married early, incredibly learning from his mother-in-law on his wedding day that his bride was Jewish, although the family was completely assimilated.

"I thought she was just trying to be mean, so I reciprocated by saying, 'Some people keep a dog or other pet at home. I'll have a Jewess,'" he recalled.

Soon after their marriage, his wife began delving into her Jewish roots and then started going to synagogue every Friday night.

"I thought, 'This is great – two or three hours every week without her, beer in the fridge and a football game on TV and friends over.'

"That was the first time I appreciated Shabbat."

While researching her genealogy in the Jewish historical archives, his wife, unbeknownst to him, dug into his family tree, triumphantly brandishing a sheaf of papers that proved he was also Jewish.

After getting over his shock, Bromson began going to the synagogue with his wife and meeting with the rabbi, learning about Judaism and undergoing conversion. He thought his biggest sacrifice would be keeping kosher, but then he learned about circumcision. He underwent a belated brit milah, and is able to joke today that everything in his life has been relatively easy since. He and his wife were remarried under the synagogue's chupah.

Devorah Shanowitz, co-director of the Chabad centre with her husband, stressed how difficult it was for Bromson to come here, confess his past and allow strangers to probe him.

But she believes it was worth it, to show that it's possible for people to change, even radically so.

"He won't let his children use the word 'hate,' not even about food," she said, "because he knows its toxicity."

Today, Bromson credits his wife with his transformation. "If I had not learned that I was Jewish, I think my life would have been wasted on nonsense."

Bromson elicited some guffaws when he said he does not think there is antisemitism in Poland today. He also said he himself has not experienced antisemitism.

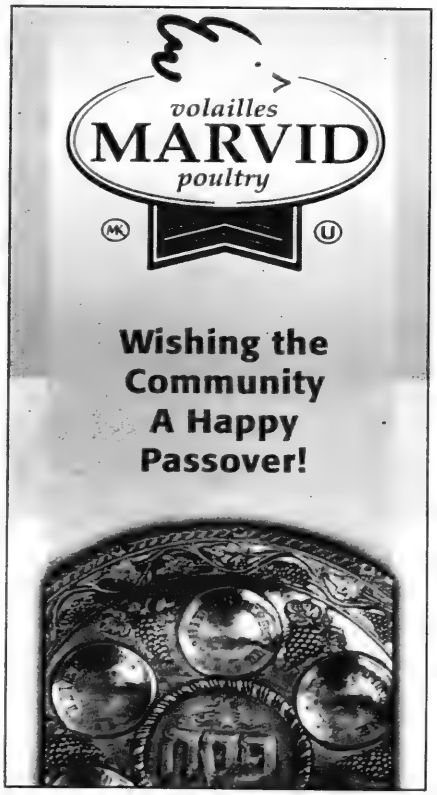
He raised some hackles when he refused to say how he felt about the state of Israel. "I am not a politician," he said.

Pressed on whether he believed Israel is the home of the Jewish nation, he only responded that "every people deserves a nation."

Some found it incredible that his wife's parents would have allowed her to marry him. Bromson said that, while his wife knew of her Jewish ancestry from the time she was a child, her parents spoke little of it. "The fact was belittled, not taken too much into account by them," he said.

If he could speak to his younger self, his advice would be: "Be proud of who you are, but everyone has to live together."

As many regrets as he has, the greatest, he said, is "I lost 22 years, not knowing I was Jewish. I am still catching up."



CJPAC party has record turnout

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

More than 1,000 young professionals and 40 politicians from all levels of government recently mingled at the sixth annual ACTION party organized by the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC).

The event, held this year March 29 at Toronto's Skywalk, encourages young Jewish Canadians and pro-Israel supporters to become politically active and make an impact on issues of concern in the community.

"Young professionals often think of politicians as being out of reach and assume it's impossible to impact Canadian politics. The ACTION party is an informal environment that helps build relationships while highlighting how easy it is to become politically engaged," said Sara Lefton, event co-chair along with Michelle Golfman, Matthew Lerner and Jared Tessis.

This year's party featured live entertainment, an open bar and hors d'oeuvres. Government officials in attendance included members of Parliament Carolyn Bennett and Monte Kwinter, Ontario Opposition Leader Tim Hudak, MPP Peter Shurman, Toronto Mayor Rob Ford, Coun. Josh Colle and Israeli Consul General Amir Gissin.

"The ACTION party is a unique and entertaining way to accomplish our mandate," Lefton said. "It allows us to showcase our efforts and to celebrate the work we do. It's one of our most recognized programs."

Matthew Solomon, a young professional who has attended the party for four years straight, said ACTION was the first Jewish event he experienced upon moving to Toronto from Montreal.

"Not only is it one of the premiere parties of the year in the Jewish community, but it's most paramount to bring young Jewish professionals and politicians together in order to promote pro-Israel leadership in the Diaspora and specifically here in Canada," he said.

ACTION provides an opportunity for young professionals and politicians to unite in a relaxed and casual atmosphere, Lefton said. "We are constantly looking for different and unique places to hold our event and this year is no exception. With its striking views and sweeping windows, the Skywalk is a Toronto landmark, but it has never been used for an event of this nature."

A similar party is scheduled for Montreal on May 17.

Lefton said the event is not a fundraiser "in the traditional sense," as it is "focused on encouraging political engagement rather than donations for CJPAC. That said, all donations are used to fund programs that engage the community in political activity."

Parliamentary committee to help build nations and peace

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler and Tory Senator Linda Frum are co-chairing a new committee that will enable Canadian parliamentarians of all political stripes to encourage nation-building and peace in the Middle East, Cotler announced at a March 27 Ottawa press conference.

Called the House-Senate Committee on Middle East Peace, Justice and the Rule of Law, it will serve as a non-partisan venue for "targeted efforts to help build free and democratic societies anchored in the rule of law," Cotler said.

He added that he would also welcome the participation of the new leader of the NDP, Thomas Mulcair.

Cotler said the committee is being formed in the context of the continuing upheaval and turmoil in the Arab world, including Egypt, Syria and elsewhere.

"We can't focus only on the Israeli-Palestinian issue," Cotler told The CJN. "Everything interacts, and we want to have a more comprehensive, a more global approach to fostering human rights and democratic institutions, and the rule of law."

Cotler also used the press conference to announce the formation of the Iranian Political Prisoner Advocacy Program, an initiative of the Inter-Parliamentary Group for Human Rights in Iran.

Cotler said the group will be modelled after the movement to free Soviet Jews in the 1970s and 1980s, and will hopefully see parliamentarians and politicians around the world "adopt" individual Iranian political prisoners to advocate on their behalf.

CHAT choir performs rare medieval seder music

Compiled by CJN Staff

Students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan performed medieval seder music on March 27 as part of their "Sounds of Spring" musical concert at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts.

It was likely the first performance of the two pieces in almost 400 years, according to a news release from the school. The school's TCK singers – eight boys and 16 girls – sang Adir Hu and Ki Lo Naeh, Ki Lo Yaeh to tunes that were published in a 1644 Haggadah by Christian scholar Johannes Ringel.

The Haggadah came to the attention of Tanenbaum-CHAT's director of education Paul Shaviv through a blog (onthemainline.blogspot.ca). Music teachers Jacklyn Klimitz and Janice Rose decoded and transcribed the music with the help of computer software.

The concert featured an eclectic selection of music including jazz, classic, Klezmer and a song from the musical Wicked.

"The medieval music is a rare window into how seder evenings must have sounded four centuries ago," Rose said. The performance can be seen at http://bit.ly/GX-h3XA.

CENTRE FOR DYNAMIC LEARNING

THE COMING WAR BETWEEN THE GENERATIONS: CAN WE RESOLVE IT ?

The Centre for Dynamic Learning is proud to host DAVID CRAVIT, author of "The New Old" (2008) and Vice-President of Zoomer Media as he launches his new book, BEYOND AGE RAGE.

Is there a real 'war' or is it just rhetoric? What are the issues? What's coming next? Join us for this enlightening talk and meet David Cravit on Thursday, April 26 at 7:30pm when the author will discuss the key ideas in his provocative new book. We look forward to a lively and stimulating evening.

Light refreshments will be served.

This event is co-sponsored by the Slodovnick Endowment Fund.

ETHICS AND SOCIAL JUSTICE

Thursdays May 3 to May 31, 1:30 – 3:30pm

Come join us as we explore some key issues together, inviting thoughtful people to present background on a topic leading to discussing such issues as:

How far should free speech be allowed to go if it might be harmful to someone or some group? Should someone who may be ill and in pain, and wishes to get help to end their lives, be allowed to do so, or should the principle of life preservation prevail? What are the ethical obligations on the media to be fair and balanced in all cases? Are they? In business, should the right to make money in the free market be limited only by whatever legal regulations are in place or should ethical considerations be equally constraining? Should society expect us to donate organs to fill the need or should we all have the right to refuse both while alive and post-mortem?

Dates and presenters are being finalized for these sessions and will be announced in early April. Check out the website for up-to-date information and look for our flyer coming out around Passover...

What type are you?

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

There are two types of cooks when it comes to Passover.

There are those who scramble through recipes and old notes trying to recreate the Passovers of their childhood, and serve the same traditional dishes each year.

Then there are those who want their seder meal to be modern and sophisticated. They watch food shows on television and browse through gourmet cookbooks for inspiration and to see what can be converted to a Passover recipe.

Whichever type of cook you are, there is one indisputable dish that will be on almost everyone's menu – the pièce de résistance of the seder table: chicken soup with matzah balls, like your bubbie made.

BUBBIE'S MATZAH BALL SOUP

When buying chicken to make soup, it's preferable to use large chickens because they are meatier.

4-5 lb. chicken and bones cut into eight pieces
1 or more turkey necks
16 cups water
1 large onion peeled and cut in half
2 stalks of celery, cut in 1/2-in. pieces
1 small parsnip root, peeled
1 small celery root, peeled and cut into quarters
3 large carrots, peeled and cut into 1/4- to 1/2-in. rounds
5 garlic cloves
1 tbsp.paprika
1/2 bunch fresh parsley
1/2 bunch fresh dill
2 bay leaves
salt and pepper

Wash the chicken pieces and turkey necks and place in a large stockpot. Add all vegetables and top with water. Add remaining ingredients. Bring to a simmer and skim. Let simmer, half-covered, for about 2 hours. For best results and a clear, flavourful broth, do not let the soup boil at any time. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Serves 8-10.

Serving Tips: Cool down before refrigerating. Before reheating, skim all the fat from the top and discard. The soup can be served with or without the vegetables. I like to pass the vegetables and necks separately and let guests serve themselves.

MATZAH BALLS

If you end up with leftover matzah balls they're delicious sautéed in oil with browned onions and served as a side dish.

1 cup water
1/2 cup margarine or vegetable oil
1 cup matzah meal
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
3 eggs
pinch of white pepper

In a saucepan bring water and margarine to a boil. While still on the flame, carefully add matzah meal and salt and mix together to make a paste (about 1 minute). Cool down to a temperature comfortable to the touch.

Bringing back recipes from the past

Add eggs one by one (if the mixture is too hot, the eggs will coagulate), mixing after each addition until eggs are completely incorporated (this step can be done with an electric mixer).

Bring a large pot of salted water to a boil. With wet hands, shape mixture into balls and drop into boiling water. (Make balls smaller than desired since they will almost double in size while cooking.)

Boil for about 45-50 minutes until the balls float, removing with a slotted spoon. Makes about 24.

MUSHROOM PATE

A delicious appetizer or side dish for the modern seder table. Serve on matzah.

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1/4 cup chopped onion
1 oz. dried porcini mushrooms
2 tbsp. hot water
1/4 cup kosher dry red wine
1 lb. mixed wild mushrooms such as oyster, cremini and shiitake
1/2 tsp. salt, or to taste
1/2 tsp. pepper, or to taste
2 tbsp. lemon juice

Combine vegetable oil and onion in a wide skillet. Cook over medium heat until translucent, about 5 minutes.

Combine dried mushrooms with hot water and red wine. Allow to soak a few minutes until soft, then drain and chop mushrooms, reserving the soaking liquid.

Chop the fresh wild mushrooms. Add to onion mixture. Add chopped porcini mushrooms and cook on high heat for 2-3 minutes. Add reserved soaking liquid. Cook another minute or so.

Purée in a blender. If blend is too dry, add a little more wine. Add salt, pepper and lemon juice. Serve with matzah. Makes about 1 cup.

And for the vegetarians or those looking for healthy dishes…

WHOLE GRAIN MATZAH KUGEL

3 whole-grain or whole-wheat matzot
6 eggs
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 cup golden raisins
1/2 cup chopped black walnuts or English walnuts
4 apples, shredded (use a combination of granny smith and golden delicious)
1/3 cup orange juice
3 to 4 tsp. cinnamon sugar
1/4 cup vegetable oil

Preheat oven to 350. Break matzot into pieces. Soak in warm water until soft, but still with a little "bite," like al dente pasta (about 2 minutes). Drain.

Beat eggs. Add sugar, salt and cinnamon. Stir in matzah. Add raisins, nuts and apples. Pour into greased 9x13-in. baking pan. Drizzle orange juice over top. Sprinkle with cinnamon sugar. Drizzle with oil. Bake for 45 minutes or until browned. Let sit for a few minutes before cutting. Makes 8 servings.

Courts look at ability to pay for activities

Family Matters

John Syrtash

Question: I live in Ontario. When I retire I will be earning $42,000 per year. My ex-wife also has other children, and expenses such as private school, camp, psychologist. Do I have to pay for these in addition to the support indicated in the table? For example, if the total of these expenses is $30,000 and she earns the same as me, do I have to pay an additional $15,000?

Answer: It depends on many factors. First, the expense must be found by the court to be "special or extraordinary." If a court is to impose such payments, it will do so against both parents in proportion to their respective gross (not net, after-tax) incomes.

So which expenses will the courts in Ontario truly consider "special and extraordinary" and under what circumstances? Under section 7 of the Child Support Guidelines the court must "take into account the necessity of the expense in relation to the means of the spouses and those of the child and to the family's spending pattern prior to the separation."

In addition, if the recipient spouse gets a tax break or other benefit for a day-care expense or obtains a subsidy that the other spouse will not benefit from when he pays his share, then the court must take that into account when calculating his contribution.

Moreover, if someone is retiring, then even if his children were attending private schools at the time he separated from his wife, it may be that it is no longer realistic to expect him to contribute to that luxury. That is especially true if making that payment over and above the table amount would compromise his ability to afford basics such as food, clothing and shelter on an after-tax basis.

The courts first look at the payer's ability to pay. If it is there then the court will almost always find day care or nannies to be "special or extraordinary" if the custodial parent works, is currently looking for work or is going to school.

Equally important are extended health-insurance premiums or specific non-OHIP health costs, especially dentists. And if there is enough money, which there may not be in your case, orthodontists are also likely to be important. Psychologists? Maybe not, if a child psychiatrist that OHIP covers can provide the same services. But with very long waiting lists, that may not be possible or in the child's best interest.

Overnight camp you can no longer afford (day camp, you might). But for higher income-earners, it's usually ordered. The toughest questions: extra-curricular activities, like hockey or other sporting opportunities. Are they truly "special or extraordinary" activities?

Are hockey, figure skating and the like "special or extraordinary" expenses?

The answer depends not only on the payer's ability to pay, as discussed above, but also on where you live. In Ontario (unlike some other provinces), a Judge would likely order both parents to contribute to at least part of their child's hockey expenses in proportion to their respective gross incomes.

In one reported case, a Judge ordered that the husband would not have to contribute to skating lessons but would have to pay towards the special travel costs of the child's skating competition overseas. Under section 7 of the Child Support Guidelines, much depends on the facts of each case: the number of children, the income of each of the parents, who has what kind of custody, the type of expense, which province, and whether the expense was paid for at the time of separation.

More specific information about special or extraordinary expenses can be obtained by consulting the Spousal Support Database at www.spousalsupport.com.

To all my readers and from my family, Garfin Zeidenberg and I, we would like to wish you a "chag kasher v'sameach!"

Russian Holocaust scholar visits University of Toronto

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

In discussions about the Holocaust, the number of Jews murdered on Soviet territory is often overlooked, minimized, or simply not examined due to a lack of accessible information, says Ilya Altman, a leading scholar in Holocaust studies from the Russian State University for Humanities in Moscow and a Yad Vashem fellow.

Altman was visiting Toronto for the first time to give the annual Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Lecture in Holocaust Studies. His talk was the keynote lecture of an international conference on Soviet Jewry during the Holocaust held by the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

The conference, titled "Jewish Life and Death in the Soviet Union during World War II," brought together academics from Europe, Israel and the United States during the last weekend of March.

"Soviet propaganda... was very clear that Nazis killing Jews was not special, but that they were killed as Soviet citizens," said Altman.

He added that between 2.6 to 2.8 million Jews were killed on Soviet territory during World War II. This staggering number represents nearly half of all the Jewish deaths in the Holocaust. But this number was often eclipsed by the overall total of 27 million Soviet deaths during the war, he said.

Ilya Altman

Altman was working in the Central State Archive in Russia when, in the late 1980s, he found an extensive collection of accounts about the murder of Jews on Soviet land, and of how the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee tried to commemorate the horrible deaths. In 2008, he published an edited collection of these accounts, called The Unknown Black Book.

"Everybody's family lost somebody during the war," said Altman, explaining that this is partly why the massive number of Soviet Jewish deaths didn't receive special attention in Russia.

Another reason, he added, was because the killing of Jews often occurred in shooting massacres or forced marches, and not in the death camps that are often associated with the Holocaust.

Even today, decades after research began on the topic of Soviet Jews in World War II, people around the world, and especially in Russia, are just beginning to realize the extent of the organized murder of Jews on Soviet territory.

"Only in more recent years, Russian society has come to understand the Holocaust," Altman said.

In 1991, Altman co-founded the Russian Research and Educational Holocaust Center in Moscow. It was the first organization of its kind in eastern Europe.

As he explained in his lecture, which contained information and stories from the archival content that fills The Unknown Black Book, Altman has made it an important part of his career to ensure that Soviet Jewish Holocaust victims are commemorated and that the Holocaust becomes a part of Russia's school curriculum.

Altman said he hopes to continue to bring to light the unknown atrocities and to have the Russian people see them as distinct from the millions of Soviet casualties of the war.

Altman began and concluded his lecture with the same message about the significance of public understanding and acknowledgement of the Holocaust in Russia: "Holocaust education in my country is very, very important," he said.

PYNK addresses the needs of young breast cancer patients

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Dr. Ellen Warner, a medical oncologist at Sunnybrook Hospital, says she is passionate about PYNK.

A breast cancer program for young women, PYNK is the first of its kind in Canada to address their special clinical, psychological, research and educational needs.

Warner said the seeds for the program were planted in 2004 at the San Antonio Breast Cancer Symposium, when she attended a session on young women with breast cancer.

"We discovered the unique issues these young women face, which the majority of women with breast cancer, who are on average in their 60s, do not have to deal with.

"Some of these issues are a higher risk of recurrence and death, infertility, early menopause, sexual dysfunction and body image problems, more fragile relationships with partners/husbands, small kids to take care of, financial pressures because of job loss or interruption of schooling."

Ellen Warner

When the session was over, she said, she and her colleague decided that these women needed a special program.

One of the first obstacles they faced was raising enough money to hire a nurse specifically devoted to helping the women navigate the complex maze of appointments, referrals and tests, and support them and their family from the time of diagnosis through treatment and followup.

"The hospital administration loved the idea, but couldn't spare a cent to make it happen. But when I shared my vision with Ricky Fitzerman, a Jewish breast cancer patient – who has since died – she got so excited she got together a group of friends and did an event at Beth Sholom Synagogue called Maj 4 Mammaries, which raised $65,000."

In addition to the special support the PYNK program gives young women, she said, "we also perform a lot of research focusing on questions critical to this young age group, including a collaboration with Harvard's Dana-Farber Cancer Center, looking at the relationship between tumour biology, which is more aggressive in young women, and patient ethnicity."

Another mandate of the program, she said, is to educate physicians about the need to diagnose cancer earlier in these women, and to educate other oncologists about how to manage the young women more appropriately.

"Unfortunately, there are still doctors out there who don't bother referring these women for fertility preservation before they start chemo, because they [don't realize these women] can freeze embryos or eggs and safely get pregnant later."

The concept of the program has appealed to a number of physicians, she said, and last year she was contacted by Tel Hashomer Hospital in Israel, who wanted to copy it.

They are now desperate, she said, because now that Fitzerman has died – a second event raised $100,000 – there is no one able to take on the task of fundraising.

"We had another funding source, but because of the economy, they will no longer be able to fund us. We are desperately hoping that PYNK will become someone's pet charity."

TZEDAKAH SANDWICHES: Bialik Hebrew Day School students Alex S. and Serena L-R., along with their classmates in Grade 7, prepared sandwiches that they brought to school to donate to Ve'ahavta, which will be distributed to Toronto's homeless.

Heart disease kills more women than cancer

Heart disease and stroke is the number 1 killer of women in Canada, taking nearly 35,000 lives each year. That's more than all forms of cancer combined.

Most women have at least one risk factor for heart disease and stroke, yet women aren't aware of this.

In 2011, the Heart and Stroke Foundation found that too many Canadians are in denial about the risk factors for heart disease. There are risk factors you can't control, such as age, gender, family history and ethnicity. But some of the risk factors contributing to heart disease and stroke can be controlled.

Reducing the risks of heart disease and stroke are as simple as physical activity. Physical inactivity has been found to be the most common of all risk factors contributing to heart disease and stroke. A recent Statistics Canada Canadian Health Measures Survey revealed that 85 per cent of Canadians don't meet the recommended amount of 150 minutes a week of moderate physical activity. That translates to only 22 minutes a day.

Physical inactivity is a contributing factor in most of the risk factors of heart disease that you can change, such as diabetes, obesity, high cholesterol and high blood pressure. Physical activity helps prevent heart disease by lowering blood pressure and increasing levels of good cholesterol in the blood, among many other things. It can also help control blood sugar levels if you have diabetes.

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

Evidence shows that physical activity provides significant benefits among all ages, ethnicities, disabilities and chronic conditions, even if you remain overweight. Exercise can also help those who already have heart disease prevent additional heart attacks.

Heart disease and stroke kill one in three Canadians, but they don't have to. Everyone can prevent and reduce their risk of heart disease by not smoking, achieving a healthy body weight, being physically active for at least 30 minutes a day and eating a healthy diet.

If you are new to exercise, consult an expert, such as a personal trainer, to help you get started. And always check with a doctor before starting any exercise program.

As you prepare for the holiday of freedom, what does freedom mean to you?

An occasional feature

Freedom from our i-pressers

It's astonishing to think that for the first time in our 2,000-year Diaspora, 21st-century Jews enjoy the opportunities and freedoms to freely practise our faith and to be as much a part of the general society as we wish. But is it true freedom? I look at so many Jews around me, both religious and secular, who are experiencing an ever-tightening stricture of their lives. Today, the great "oppressor" and divider are all the wonderful technologies that enslave us to every single ringtone, vibration and message that shows up on our phone or computer screen. Our attention spans are becoming increasingly more limited, and it's becoming harder to enjoy the people and experiences around us.

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin

Yes, I'm free, but freedom isn't always what it's cracked up to be if that freedom prevents me from enjoying life. Our sages were onto something when they said (Pirkei Avot 6:2), "The only real free person is one who engages in the Torah." They were trying to convey how many distractions are out there in the world that prevent us from stopping to smell the roses and appreciating the more profound aspects of life. Studying Judaism and meditating in prayer refocus our attentions to the really important aspects of life.

The freest time of my week is on Shabbat, when I'm sitting down with my family to enjoy their company and catch up from the busy week. No phones, no BlackBerries or iPhones, no text messaging, no e-mails. It's a mechayeh! That is why, especially today, our mandate is to experience "freedom" when we're at our seders this Passover. We've achieved freedom from our oppressors, now's our chance to achieve freedom from our i-pressers, those little gadgets with their screens and buttons we press that take us out of this real world of family, friends and love of Judaism.

Enjoy your freedom this Passover!

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin is spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill.

The heart of the immigrant's journey

Admittedly, freedom wasn't something I thought about much as I was growing up. It is not that I took freedom for granted, because I didn't, but that thoughts of freedom were more within a historical context.

I lived a blessed childhood. I grew up in a loving family where each of us had a distinct voice. Cote St Luc, in Montreal, was a safe, close-knit Jewish neighbourhood. I had the freedom to choose my path in all areas of work, love and play. Freedom was integral to my life and meant choice and opportunity.

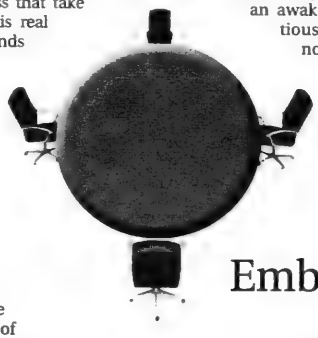
Janis Roth

Fast forward to Sept. 11, 2001, a day that shook me to the core and signalled a contemporary horror, a new reality and, with it, an awakening, a cautiousness, that has not dissipated.

It's been 11 years since then and 9 years since I started working at JIAS Toronto, where I've come to understand that freedom, more than anything else, is a core determinant of every person's future and at the heart of every immigrant's journey. Freedom to step more lightly, to trust, to stand proud, to be counted and included, to feel safe, to raise children without fear, to earn a living and to openly live Jewish values and tradition.

The holiday of freedom reminds me that while freedom remains elusive across the globe, every one of us can do our part to ensure freedom for the newcomers to our community and for our loved ones and colleagues with whom we interact every day.

Janis Roth is executive director of JIAS Toronto.



No one can take away your dream

An inward-looking journey to explore the true meaning of freedom started, in my case, 130 years ago, when my great- great-grandfather, Rabbi David Gissin, left his home in Ukraine and boarded a ship to Eretz Israel. With him on the ship was a herd of cows that he just bought with all his life savings. Being an avid reader of the Torah, he dreamed all his life of the green slopes of the Judean Mountains. In his vision, he saw his cows grazing lazily against the biblical backdrop.

Amir Gissin

It never happened.

Half the cows died at sea, while the other half was handed, upon arrival to Jaffa port, to a Bedouin shepherd. The shepherd left with the herd toward the mountains of Judea, and was never seen again. Six generations later, our family still awaits his return…

Rabbi Gissin was terribly naïve, but he was a free man. He went against common wisdom and left his hometown to start a new life, based only on a dream, a vision. For me, that is the ultimate form of freedom – to act upon your vision and to follow your dream. He left our family a legacy of true love for the Land of Israel, and a somewhat limited talent for business.

Yes, sometimes someone will disappear with your herd, but no one can take away your dream.

For me, that is the true meaning of freedom.

Amir Gissin is consul general of Israel to Ontario and Western Canada.

Embrace our duty as a people

Freedom has many definitions and philosophical concepts behind it, such as being in a state of liberty, free will and no oppression. However, one dimension of freedom that stands out for me is the concept of political and national independence or sovereignty. That freedom to me is called the State of Israel.

For thousands of years, the Jewish nation has been persecuted, exiled and dispersed. The dream of returning to the Jewish ancestral homeland, however, never vanished. Regardless of the geo-political tensions surrounding the State of Israel, the Jewish people have come home. It is a warm and welcoming home, where being at liberty and being Jewish go hand in hand – a sovereign entity that is not a state for the Jews, but rather a Jewish state that applies the liberties and freedoms it has always desired to all of its citizens. I cannot help but think of how fortunate I am to be able to experience the freedom that my ancestors only dreamed of.

Alexandra Izso

As Passover approaches, it is important to remember to embrace our duty as the Jewish People – the duty to preserve our sovereignty while never forgetting the struggle and patience it took to attain it. Freedom is very powerful in granting individual liberties, but there is nothing more powerful than a people, previously dispersed around the world, being able to say that they are finally free together.

Alexandra Izso is a fourth-year political economy student at Carleton University.

Mossad reducing activity in Iran, Time reports

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — A Time magazine report revealed on Friday that Israeli intelligence services have scaled back their covert operations inside Iran.

According to senior security officials who spoke to the magazine, operations have been reduced in areas such as high-profile missions, including assassinations and detonations at Iranian missile bases, as well as in recruiting spies inside the Iranian nuclear program and efforts to gather on-the-ground intelligence.

The report further states that according to one official, the reductions have caused "increasing dissatisfaction" within the Mossad, Israel's intelligence agency. Another official credits the decrease in activities to the reluctance of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who the official says is worried about the outcome if the operations are discovered.

According to Time, Iranian intelligence already cracked a cell trained and equipped by the Mossad. Western intelligence confirmed that the detailed confession of Majid Jamali Fashid over the January 2010 assassination by motorcycle bomb of nuclear scientist Massoud Ali Mohmmadi was genuine, and blamed a third country for exposing the cell.

Scaling back covert operations against Iran carries costs, Time magazine said, especially as Iran hurries to disperse its centrifuges into facilities deep underground. In one intelligence finding, an Israeli official says Iran itself estimates that sabotage to date has set back its centrifuge program by two full years. The computer virus known as Stuxnet is only the best known of a series of efforts to slow the Iranian program.

Ali Khamenei

That effort involves a variety of governments besides Israel, as well as equipment made to purposely malfunction after being tampered with before it physically entered Iran, the report says. The setbacks have prompted Iran to announce it would manufacture all components of its nuclear program itself – something outside experts are highly skeptical Tehran has the ability to actually do.

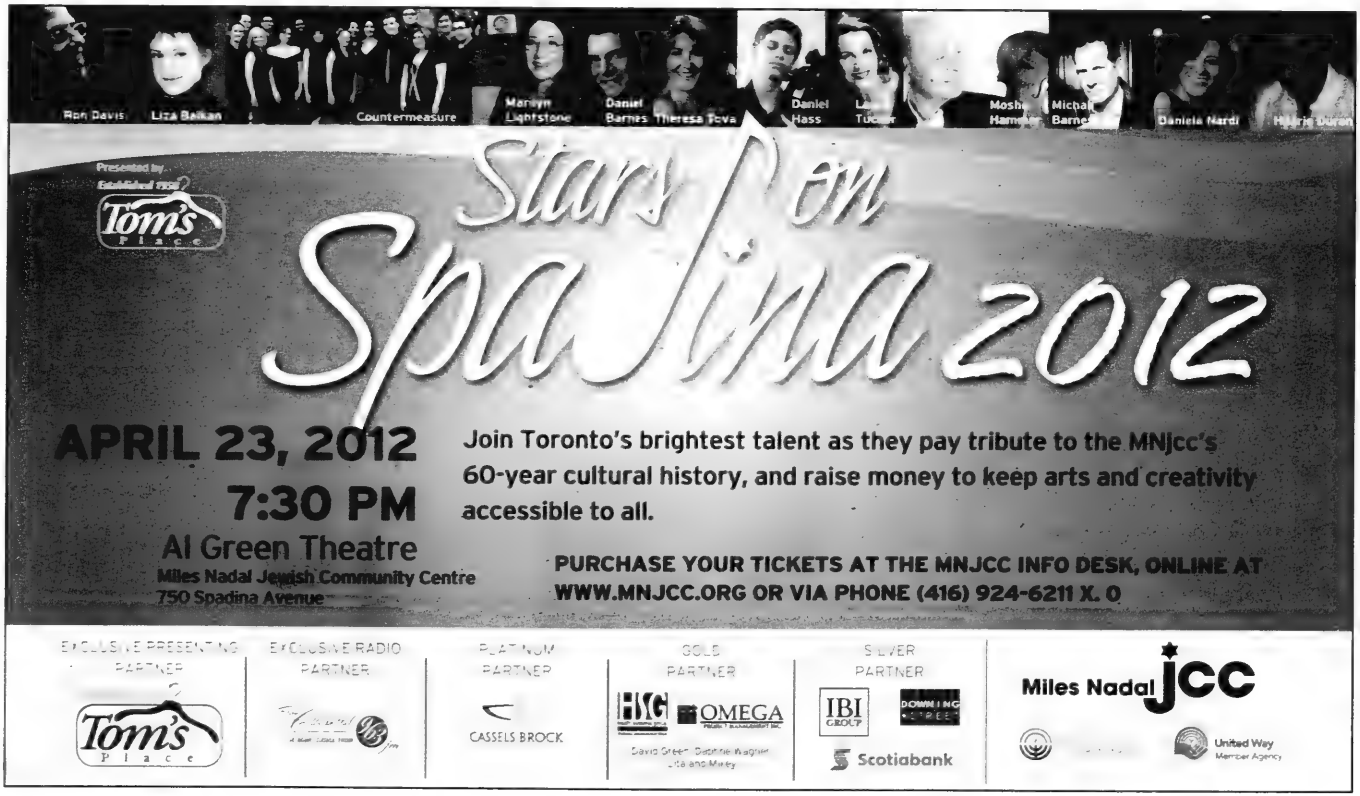
In related news, citing intelligence sources, Sky News is reporting that a secret Iranian network of assassins is under orders to attack Jewish, Israeli and western targets in Turkey.

The organization behind the attack is called Unit 400, a secret wing of Islamic Jihad's al-Quds Brigades, under the direct command of Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Sky reported over the weekend.

"Unit 400 of the Quds Force has been developing in the last few months a standing operating procedure for carrying out an attack in Turkey against western targets as well as Israeli and Jewish," an intelligence source told Sky News. "It is our firm assessment that these procedures are in a very advanced stage, and that the intention is to act on the plans very soon."

A document obtained by Sky News also suggests that Unit 400 is behind the car bomb attack in New Delhi that injured the wife of an Israeli diplomat, as well as attempted attacks in the Georgian capital of Tbilisi and in Thailand.

Attacks on Israeli targets have occurred in recent years in Turkey, including last year when six Turkish civilians were hurt during an attack on the Israeli Consulate in Istanbul blamed on Unit 400.



Argentina resumes investigation into bombings

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Israel's UN envoy praised Argentina for reinvigorating its investigation on Friday of a deadly 1994 bombing of a Jewish centre in Buenos Aires that Argentine authorities have blamed on Iran.

"I think they're re-energizing" their work on the case, Israel's UN Ambassador Ron Prosor told reporters.

"In the past, there was not a real motivation to check [the facts]," he said. "I see it differently today. One should give them credit for it. I see it differently today on the Argentinian side."

The bombing of the Argentine Israeli Mutual Association building killed 85 people and injured hundreds of others. In 2007, Argentine authorities secured Interpol arrest warrants for five Iranians and a Lebanese in connection with the attack.

Tehran denied links to the bombing but last July offered to hold talks with Argentina to start "shedding light" on the case.

The bombing virtually froze Argentina's relations with Iran, though the two countries have recently expressed a desire to have better relations.

Argentine President Cristina Fernandez told the UN General Assembly last September that Buenos Aires was ready to engage in dialogue with Iran.

Concerned about a possible warming of ties between Iran and Argentina, including a sharp increase in bilateral trade, western and Israeli officials expressed concern that Buenos Aires was quietly reaching out to Tehran while they were seeking to isolate Iran over its nuclear program.

They also voiced concerns that Argentina might have lost its interest in pursuing investigations of the 1994 Jewish centre attack, as well as the 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, in which 29 people were killed.

The Islamic Jihad Organization, believed to be linked to Iran and the Lebanese militant group Hezbollah, claimed responsibility for the 1992 bombing.

For more than a decade, Argentina appeared to do little to investigate the two attacks. But former Argentine president Nestor Kirchner vowed to reopen the cases when he took office in 2003, calling the failure to push investigation of the cases "a national disgrace."

Several years later, former Iranian president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani was among those indicted by Argentine prosecutors for the 1994 bombing and sought by Interpol.

Fernandez, who is Kirchner's widow and was re-elected to a second term last year, and Argentine Foreign Minister Hector Timerman were invited by Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Daniel Ayalon to visit Israel this year, Argentina's Jewish News Agency reported earlier this month.

Ayalon extended the invitation during a visit to Argentina to mark the 20th anniversary of the Israeli Embassy bombing, according to the news agency, which quoted him as saying the trip would deepen "the level of strategic and political dialogue between Argentina and Israel."

Globe Theatre urged to cancel Israeli company's invite

JTA

JERUSALEM — Three dozen British directors, writers and actors called on Shakespeare's Globe Theatre in London to cancel an invitation to an Israeli theatre company.

In an open letter published March 29 in the Guardian, the cultural figures expressed "dismay and regret" that Israel's National Theater, Habima, will perform The Merchant of Venice in the Globe to Globe festival in April. The six-week festival at the Globe will feature Shakespeare's 37 plays performed in 37 languages. A Palestinian theatre company is scheduled to perform Richard II in Arabic.

Habima "has a shameful record of involvement with illegal Israeli settlements in occupied Palestinian territory," the letter said, citing the fact the company has agreed to perform in the culture centres of two large Israeli settlements and threatened repercussions against any actors or directors who decide out of conscience not to perform there.

"By inviting Habima, Shakespeare's Globe is undermining the conscientious Israeli actors and playwrights who have refused to break international law," the letter said.

Among the signatories to the letter are actress Emma Thompson and playwright Caryl Churchill.

Canadian immigrant wins Israeli talent show

JTA

JERUSALEM — A Canadian immigrant to Israel won the first season of Israel's musical talent reality show The Voice.

Kathleen Reiter, 23, who made aliyah from Montreal just weeks before her audition, won the competition last Saturday night, receiving the most votes from the Israeli viewing audience. Reiter won an international recording contract with Universal Helicon, an Israeli record label.

She already spoke Hebrew, thanks to her Hebrew-speaking Israeli parents.

Reiter was mentored by Israeli pop star Sarit Hadad. She defeated finalist Raz Shmueli, who was mentored by Israeli rock star Aviv Geffen.

The Voice is based on the successful U.S. model and received very high ratings in Israel.

The finalists will set off for a countrywide tour in May, in which they will perform their best-known songs, along with some of the songs that made their mentors famous.

Abbas honours anti-Israel reporter

JERUSALEM — Nearly two years have passed since longtime American journalist Helen Thomas was forced to resign after making antisemitic comments on camera.

Since then, Thomas has been the subject of fierce criticism from both ends of the American political spectrum and from her fellow journalists. But on Sunday, she received an award – an honour reportedly from none other than Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

In May 2010 at a White House event commemorating Jewish Heritage Week, Thomas, the senior White House writer, was asked for her opinion of Israel. "Tell them that they need to get out of Palestine and return home to Germany, Poland, and America," Thomas responded on camera.

As a result of her comment, an onslaught of public criticism forced Thomas to apologize and retire. Shortly after her retirement, however, Thomas claimed she had said "exactly what she thought." As a result of the comments, the Society of Professional Journalists decided to discontinue the yearly lifetime achievement award bearing Thomas' name.

Helen Thomas

It seems, however, that there is, in fact, someone who sees Thomas and her comments in a more positive light. On Sunday, dozens of diplomats and journalists assembled in Washington for an event in her honour. The man responsible for organizing the event was the head of the Palestine Liberation Organization Mission to the United States, Maen Areikat.

Representatives of the PLO in Washington released a statement claiming that the text of the prize was written to "recognize Thomas' long career in the field of journalism, during which she defended the Palestinian position every step of the way."

The event was also attended by PLO executive committee member Hanan Ashrawi, who presented the medal to Thomas, bestowing upon her the honour said to have come from Abbas himself. According to the Washington PLO office's statement, Ashrawi "presented Thomas with the appreciation and blessing of the president and the Palestinian people for all of her actions supporting Palestine in the West."

Three months ago, Thomas, 91, granted an interview to CNN, her first after a long period of silence following the events that caused the embarrassing end to her career. She did not repeat her previous comments, though she blamed the Zionist lobby in Washington for distorting her comments.

"Everything is distorted, but I don't care," Thomas said. "You have organized lobbyists in favour of Israel. You can't open your mouth. I can call the president of the U.S. anything in the book, but you say one thing about Israel and you're off limits."

When asked if she had any regrets, Thomas replied, "I have regrets that everybody has misinterpreted it and distorted it. You have [former White House press secretary] Ari Fleischer and [Anti-Defamation League president] Abe Foxman distorting everything."

Will Toulouse murders affect French election?

Daniel Hoffman
JTA

PARIS — With the first round of France's presidential election less than four weeks away, the attacks that left four Jews and three French soldiers dead are reshaping the race – but for now, it's not clear exactly how.

In the days leading up to the attacks, President Nicolas Sarkozy had managed to close most of the gap behind the leader in the polls, Socialist candidate Francoise Hollande, with a rightward turn that included calls by Sarkozy in favour of tougher immigration restrictions and against the labelling of halal meat.

Nicolas Sarkozy

Since the March 19 attack on the Jewish Ozar Hatorah school in Toulouse, Sarkozy has announced several measures to clamp down on right-wing and Islamic extremists. He ordered French security forces to seek out Muslim extremists, barred an influential Egyptian Sunni cleric from attending a conference in France next month and urged TV networks not to air footage of the Toulouse attack and the one on soldiers in nearby Montauban that had been delivered to the Al Jazeera bureau here.

On March 23, police commandos reportedly arrested 19 people and seized weapons during morning raids in Toulouse and other cities. Sarkozy promised more action in the weeks ahead.

While politicians across the political spectrum condemned the attacks, Sarkozy won praise from the Jewish community for suspending his campaign and flying to Toulouse immediately after the school shooting, calling it "obviously antisemitic" and saying that the "whole republic" was mobilized to face the tragedy.

But it's not clear how long the focus will remain on security before shifting back to the main issue facing France: the economy.

"The political debate will probably refocus on the fundamental economic topics," said Jean-Yves Camus, a political scientist who specializes in right-wing extremism. "Still, it is very important to French Jews to make the population understand that the Toulouse attack does not only concern their community but the whole country."

French Jews, he said, "will most certainly vote for politicians with solid experience who are able to put in practice legal and credible measures to answer an Islamic threat."

The latest national polls show Sarkozy and his centre-right Union for a Popular Movement, or UMP, trailing Hollande by a percentage point or two in the first round scheduled for April 22, but by a wider gap in a theoretical runoff scheduled for May 6.

Since the Toulouse attack, the National Front, France's largest far-right party, has tried to take advantage of the changed climate. Last week, party leader Marine Le Pen promised to "bring radical Islam to its knees." In her speech Le Pen, who has been polling at approximately 15 per cent, also linked mass immigration with fundamentalism and denounced the risk of a "green fascism."

Few observers believe that many Jews will opt for the National Front, even though Le Pen has sought to woo Jewish voters and distance herself and her party from the antisemitism of her father, Jean-Marie Le Pen, who founded the National Front.

The Jewish community, whose 600,000 members comprise less than 1 per cent of the total French population, remains more supportive of Sarkozy's party than the general public. But prior to the Toulouse shootings, a survey of the Jewish electorate showed that Sarkozy had lost support among Jews, even though he remained more popular than any other single candidate.

According to a March 9 poll from the French polling institute IFOP, Sarkozy's favorable ratings among Jews had fallen to 43 per cent as of January from 62 per cent in May 2007, when Sarkozy was elected president. The main reason, said Jerome Fourquet, who directed the survey for IFOP, was France's economy.

"The trend is similar to the French general electorate's disaffection with Sarkozy," Fourquet said. "People are dissatisfied with the economic situation and their purchasing power."

For many Jews, the economy is not the only source of discontent with the president. In early March, Sarkozy's prime minister, Francois Fillon, made controversial statements about halal and kosher slaughter rituals, declaring that the "ancestral traditions" in Islam and Judaism were "outdated."

The comment provoked a strong reaction from Jewish leaders.

Analysis

"As religion and state are strictly separated in France, politicians should avoid giving their opinion on these topics," said Richard Prasquier, president of the CRIF, the main French umbrella organization for Jewish institutions.

More widely, French moderates also have expressed concern about Sarkozy's tilt to the right. A week before the Toulouse shootings, Sarkozy told an audience that France has "too many foreigners" and proposed cutting legal immigration in half.

Thirty years ago, most Jews leaned toward the Socialist Party. Francois Mitterrand, a Socialist who served as president of France from 1981 to 1995, was considered a friend of Israel – an image he developed after his 1982 address to the Knesset, where he emphasized the Jewish state's right to security.

But the Jewish vote drifted toward the UMP during the second intifadah, when many leftist organizations took a pro-Palestinian stance and violence against French Jews soared.

In related news, Ozar Hatorah has received a rash of antisemitic hate mail and phone calls since the shooting. The school complained to the local prosecutor about the harassing mail and phone calls, the French news agency AFP reported. Prosecutor Michel Valet has ordered a police investigation into the incidents. The school's e-mail system reportedly filled up with messages calling for the murder of Jews and linking the attack to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, according to AFP.

Meanwhile, shooter Mohamed Merah was buried last week in a cemetery on the outskirts of Toulouse, despite objections from the city's mayor. Algerian authorities had refused to allow Merah's body to enter the country for burial, Reuters reported, citing an official at the Grand Mosque of Paris. His Algerian-born father had wanted him to be buried in the North African country.

Israel Briefs

Fatah, Hamas not yet united

The Palestinian reconciliation deal between Fatah, headed by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, and Hamas has broken down. "Unity is frozen," Abbas said from Baghdad, where he was attending the Arab League summit. Abbas said he and Hamas leader Khalid Meshal agree "on the vision and objectives and conditions in full," but that some Hamas leaders have not accepted the agreement signed last May in Cairo.

Putin coming for dinner

Vladimir Putin, president-elect of Russia, intends to visit Israel this summer. The date has yet to be formally announced, the Israeli media reported, but will come after Putin's May 7 inauguration. Putin reportedly is interested in unveiling a monument in Netanya to Jewish Red Army soldiers who fought in World War II, Ha'aretz reported, citing a senior Israeli official. A Putin visit last year was cancelled due to a strike by Israeli Foreign Ministry employees. In a call earlier this month to congratulate Putin on winning the presidency, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu invited Putin to visit Israel, Ha'aretz reported.

Mofaz heads Kadima

Shaul Mofaz defeated Tzipi Livni to become the new leader of Israel's Kadima Party. Mofaz received 62 per cent of the vote in the March 27 Kadima primary to unseat Livni as the leader of Israel's main opposition party. Forty-five per cent of the party's 95,000 registered members voted in the primary. The Iranian-born Mofaz is a former chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces. Previous party heads were founder Ariel Sharon and Ehud Olmert. Recent polls suggested that Kadima, which has 28 seats in the current Knesset, will likely see its support plunge dramatically in the next elections.

Young Jews gather at TribeFest

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

LAS VEGAS — For anyone curious about what organized Jewish communities will look like in the years to come, the Jewish Federations of North America's second annual TribeFest was the place to be last week.

The three-day event held in Las Vegas at the Venetian Hotel from March 25 to 27, welcomed more than 1,400 young Jews from 81 communities in North America to celebrate Jewish culture.

TribeFest co-chair Jason Rubinoff insisted that the event was not about campaigning and fundraising. Rather, he said, it offered Jews in their 20s, 30s and early 40s an opportunity to connect to Jewish culture and identity.

Judging by the content – which included interactive sessions about climate change, making the community more welcoming to lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered Jews, and exploring the connection between Zionism and liberalism – the event focused not on the history that has shaped Jewish culture for the past 70 years, but on what will shape and influence Jewish communities in the years to come.

Filmmakers, social activists, entrepreneurs, religious leaders and community builders led the sessions during the day, while Jewish and Israeli musicians performed concerts at night.

Participants even had the opportunity to take part in a service project that sent busloads of participants to various public Las Vegas schools in low-income neigbourhoods to distribute 1,000 backpacks filled with books to students.

But the biggest draw was the opening event, one that was delivered more like a standup comedy show.

Saturday Night Live alum Rachel Dratch, who was promoting her book titled Girl Walks Into a Bar…: Comedy Calamities, Dating Disasters, and a Midlife Miracle, talked about being subconsciously Jewish, but not incorporating Jewish traditions into her life.

After cracking jokes about how crazy our traditions sound to non-Jews (on Pesach, "we wait for a ghost to come so we can drink with him") and how disgusting Jewish cuisine is ("there's got to be someone out there who can up the chocolate quality level of the Chanukah gelt!"), Dratch did speak about why it's important for her to stay connected to her Jewish roots.

"Like many Jews today, I do feel connected culturally more than religiously, but I do yearn for Judaism to inform my daily life more," she said.

"I may not know what Lag b'Omer is… but I know when I'm around other Jews, I feel at home."

A.J. Jacobs, bestselling author of A Year of Living Biblically – a book that chronicled his attempt to take every one of the commandments and mitzvot literally and incorporate them into his everyday life – also opened the event.

Jacobs pre-empted his address with a disclaimer about the role that Judaism plays in his life.

In trying to emphasize how secular his upbringing was, Jacobs said, "I'm Jewish in the same way that the Olive Garden is Italian… Shockingly, until recently, I thought the Haftorah was literally 50 per cent of the Torah."

Speaking about his experience writing his most widely received book, he said the project led him to connect with his Judaism for the first time in his life.

One of the most encouraging signs that the future of our community will be left in capable hands was 16-year-old Talia Leman.

Hearing her speak passionately about her non-profit organization called RandomKid, her poise, her wisdom far beyond her years – never mind what she's accomplished in her short life – was enough to turn the cynics into believers of the tikkun olam philosophy.

Through RandomKid, an organization led by youth to "solve the problems in the world," Leman has worked with 12 million kids from 20 countries and has raised about $11 million.

Israeli airlines concerned over open skies agreement

Zohar Blumenkrantz
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The backlash to the open skies agreement with Europe is building: Israel's airlines are ramping up their criticism of the competition-creating deal, while travel industry sources are lobbying to see the agreement through.

Israel and the European Union recently finalized the deal after three years of negotiations. It still needs the approval of Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz.

The deal, which would be implemented over the course of five years, between 2013 and 2018, would eventually allow Israeli and European airlines to compete freely over flights to and from each other's home countries.

Katz is planning to discuss the agreement with Israel's three airlines to give them a chance to voice criticism. The next battle arena is likely to be the Knesset, which will have to approve the agreement once it receives Katz's approval. Katz is expected to sign off on the deal in July or August.

"The deal between Israel and the European Union will increase the volume of incoming tourism to Israel," senior tourism sector sources told Katz and Tourism Minister Stas Misezhnikov in a letter. The signatories included Israel Hotel Association chair, Ami Federmann, and Israel Incoming Tour Operator Association chair, Shmuel Marom. "Europe is naturally the main, central source of incoming tourists. The agreement with the European Union will create new opportunities to market Israel among that audience."

Other signatories include the chairs of the car rental association, the tour guides association and the restaurants association.

They called on the ministers not to delay the agreement.

Meanwhile, El Al Israel Airlines and Arkia and Israir airlines refused to comment on the deal, despite El Al CEO Eliezer Shkedi's fierce battle against the agreement.

However, the El Al union sent a warning letter to Katz.

"We expect the transportation minister to stand behind his promise and to make sure the agreement does enough to protect Israeli airlines and their workers before it is signed," said union chair Asher Edrey. "In any case, we reserve the right to act in any way we see fit in the future."

Israeli airlines, including Arkia, will face added competition from European airlines thanks to an open skies agreement. [Flash90 photo]

The tourism industry leaders also played the employment card.

"Incoming tourism influences multiple sectors, which employ a total of 200,000 both directly and indirectly," they wrote. "The deal will enable enlarging flight capacity relative to the number of flights."

It will draw more low-cost airlines into the market to and from Israel, and tourists will have more potential flight times, they added.

Every 100,000 incoming tourists create about 3,800 jobs, they wrote. This means that if the agreement brings in another one million tourists a year, 38,000 jobs will be created at small and medium-sized businesses in tourism-centric cities and the outlying areas. Many of these jobs will go to people who are currently outside the workforce, they added.

"These people and employers need to be represented by the government no less than the employees at Israel's airlines," they wrote. "The agreement is crucial to developing incoming tourism, to increasing its percentage of the GDP and to creating more jobs in the outlying areas."

They noted that the government itself believed the agreement could help Israel achieve its goal of five million incoming tourists a year in the not-so-distant future.

The government should help the local airlines get past the implications of the agreement, while still taking the rest of the tourism sector into account, they added.

Passover gifts rise despite economic slowdown

TEL AVIV — The gifts employers give their workers for Passover are evidently no yardstick for the state of the economy. Companies are spending about 10 per cent more on gifts to employees this Passover than last year, despite signs of economic slowdown.

Employees at the Dead Sea Works, a unit of Israel Chemicals, led the way last year and this. They're each getting a cheque for 1,780 shekels ($477, all figures Cdn) plus an iPad 2.

About 1.5 million workers in Israel get a gift for the holidays. The value of this Passover gift market is estimated at about 2.7 billion shekels ($723 million) in 2012 – an increase of 10 per cent from the year before (and comparing with about 2.2 shekels billion ($589 million) for Rosh Hashanah).

A survey by the Tovanot market research institute found that a third of employees who receive vouchers would have liked something more personal.

Three-quarters of working Israelis expect to get a present for the holiday, Tovanot found, compared to 72 per cent at Rosh Hashanah. Seventy per cent figure the boss will give them a shopping voucher, one of five expects a more personal gift, while six per cent anticipate cash. Only two per cent are confident they'll get nothing.

Another survey, by the company Vaadim, which collates information on employment conditions at big enterprises, found the average value of corporate Passover gifts this year is in the range of 600 ($161) to 900 shekels ($241) per worker.

High-tech workers can expect a gift worth an average of 400 shekels ($107) to 700 shekels ($187), while executives will receive a present worth as much as 5,000 shekels ($1338).

The enormous popularity of cooking shows on Israeli television may have affected the nature of gifts this year. The most popular category of presents this year is cooking utensils, from nesting pot sets to kitchen knives. In second place are electrical appliances, such as vacuum cleaners and steam irons, followed in third place by gadgets. One of the most popular in that category is a device for locating your house or car keys.

Mal Coven - a major figure in Canadian retail

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Long before Wal-Mart established a beachhead and then a mighty presence in Canada, the BiWay chain sated the desires of Canadian shoppers hungering for quality merchandise at bargain basement prices.

With 249 discount stores in eight of Canada's 10 provinces, BiWay carried name-brand apparel and general goods ranging from household goods to health and beauty products.

"It was a working man's store," said Mal Coven, one of its proprietors, in an interview.

A major figure in Canada's retail scene for about three decades, Coven looks back at his career in his forthcoming autobiography, How to Succeed in Retirement by Really Trying and the BiWay Story.

Scheduled to be officially released on April 14 at Indigo's Manulife branch, six days after his 83rd birthday, it will be sold on Amazon.com from April 17 onward.

Published by BPS Books, Coven's book is a breezily written memoir of a marketing specialist who earned a degree in business administration at a Jesuit college and cut his teeth at an iconic department store where bargains were supposedly born.

Coven's volume is also an account of a surprisingly shy man who found true love in Quebec's Laurentian mountains, proved his acumen as a retailer in Toronto and dabbled in a series of entrepreneurial projects after his retirement.

Above all, it is about the highly competitive world of retailing in which he excelled.

Born in Boston, the son of a pedlar originally from Lithuania, Coven studied at Boston Latin School, the oldest public high school in the United States whose graduates include Benjamin Franklin and Leonard Bernstein.

Coven considered dentistry and teaching before deciding to study science and business administration at Boston College. Fresh out of college, he dreamed of becoming a buyer at Filene's, whose low prices revolutionized American retailing in the 20th century.

Having failed to get into Filene's executive training program, Coven was crushed. He turned to his cousin, an accountant and one of the founders of Staples, for advice.

His cousin said, "If you want to work for a company, go there and take any job. You are better off on the inside looking in than on the outside looking in."

Acting on this sage recommendation, Coven accepted a position as a temporary stock boy at Filene's, which closed late last year. Promoted to buyer after a phenomenally successful campaign to sell snowsuits in July, he remained with Filene's for the next decade.

He ascribes his success to two factors: determination and luck. "You need both to succeed," he said.

During a vacation in the summer of 1956, Coven drove to Montreal to see an old friend. Much to Coven's disappointment, he had gone to Winnipeg.

On a whim, Coven headed to the Laurentians. Stopping in Ste. Agathe, a resort favoured by Montreal Jews, he checked into a family hotel. At a dance, his life changed when he met his first wife-to-be, Miriam Fish, whom he described as "a tall, beautiful blond."

Miriam's brother, Abe, a retailer, eventually invited Coven to be a partner in his discount store in Toronto, one of the first of its kind in Canada. (Abe's brother, Morris, a lawyer, is now a judge on Canada's Supreme Court).

Having dreamed of opening his own store, Coven jumped at the opportunity. "We were partners from beginning to end."

Arriving in Toronto in 1962 as a landed immigrant, Coven took charge of BiWay's 1,600-square-foot store at the corner of Islington and Albion, in the west end of the city.

Mal Coven

Thanks to its formula of carrying brand-name jeans such as Levi's and Lee and selling them at reasonable prices, the store was a great success in terms of sales. "We were making about $800 to $900 per square foot," he recalled.

He avoided low-quality goods. "I never bought anything that I'd be ashamed to bring home to my family," said Coven, who has two children, Robin and David.

Coven, who became a Canadian citizen in the mid-1970s, prospered as he and his brother-in-law opened more BiWays.

After opening the fifth BiWay store, Coven's friend from Boston, Russ Jacobson, was offered a partnership in the expanding company.

"Abe, Russ and I continued to do our thing. Abe was the chief executive officer. He bought and supervised the health and beauty aids, negotiated new leases and, I would say, was the father figure. Russ and I were responsible for the buying and merchandising of the soft goods and in the preparation of the advertising."

He added, "At our peak, we were among the top 50 discounters in North America. In Canada, we were the fifth-largest seller of clothes."

By his reckoning, half of all sales were in apparel, followed by linen and bedding, health and beauty aids, and household and seasonal goods.

Dylex, a Canadian retailing conglomerate whose holdings included Tip Top Tailors, Harry Rosen, Thrifty's and Big Steel, was so impressed by BiWay's track record that it purchased a 50 per cent equity in the late 1970s, when the chain had grown to 15 stores.

"We were by far the largest of the 10 chains in Dylex's portfolio," said Coven. "We were generating as much as 40 per cent of the profits."

Coven left BiWay in 1990. "I had had enough."

Biway did not survive his departure. Acquired by a U.S. dollar-store chain owned by an Israeli corporate raider, it was ultimately shuttered.

"No one could run BiWay the way we did," he said. "It was never the same without us. It was a hands-on business."

During his post-BiWay phase, he invested in an electronics store that ultimately failed and brokered the sale of Winners – a women and men's wear chain – to an American company.

In retirement, Coven has gravitated to promoting cute novelties. He refers to these endeavours as "fun projects."

Some of the novelties, such as Italian Baseball Cards, have failed. But others, namely Pinky Puppets, have gained traction.

Lately, Coven has been working on his newest project, My First Car, a driving aid.

As always, he is busy. Never a dull moment for this bold entrepreneur.

Dancer in semifinals of TV talent competition

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Dance prodigy Shale Wagman, 11, recently performed Toreador Song from the ballet Carmen on the TV show Canada's Got Talent, earning a place in the show's semifinals.

The judges, comedian Martin Short, opera singer Measha Brueggergosman and composer Stephan Moccio, gave Shale's performance an overwhelming "yes," which allows him to advance to the live national show which airs April 15 on Citytv, when viewers will choose the performer who will advance to the next round. .

Canada's Got Talent, which premièred March 4, is billed as the largest national talent search in Canadian television history and features a colourful array of hopeful stars, including comedians, contortionists, impressionists, jugglers, magicians, ventriloquists, singers and dancers. The show has attracted an average of 1.5 million viewers.

"I am so happy right now. I hope that Canada will like me and will support my passion for dance," Shale said when he heard he had made it to the semifinals.

As Shale did perfect cartwheels by the age of three and exhibited grace and strength at a very young age, he was enrolled by his mother, Heather Wagman, in recreational dance at Vlad's Dance Company.

The company's artistic director, Vlad, has said about Shale, "He moves like a cat. I want him in competitive dance right away."

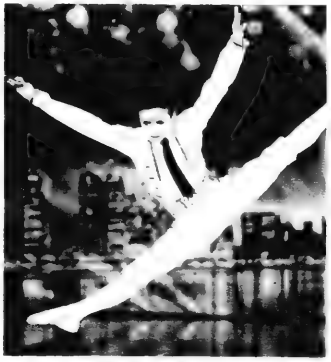
By age seven, Shale was performing solo and went to a major dance competition in Boston with the company. "Shale would be mesmerized by the other dancers and watch backstage all day," Wagman recalled.

When Shale started competing and winning trophies and prizes, it was very easy for him to get caught up in excitement. Vlad grounded Shale by instilling the awareness that "the real reward comes from accomplishing your goals you set for yourself and the knowledge that you did the best you could do. There is always more to be learned," Wagman said.

"Vlad was instrumental in challenging Shale to push himself as far as he could, and to persevere and never give up. Both Shale's dad, Michael, and I instilled in Shale not to be concerned with others' opinions. The only measure of self-worth that matters is your own."

Over the years, Shale has continued to watch, be inspired and be appreciative and respectful of other dancers.

While performing at a charity event for SOS Children's Village Foundation, a producer in the audience was awed by his performance, which led to Shale's commercial in a Maxwell House campaign promoting optimism (http://bit.ly/H85pwy).



Shale Wagman

Shale trains some 30 hours a week with the company Bridge to Artists in ballet, jazz, hip hop, contemporary, modern, acrobatics and lyrical dance.

"The studio has been like a second family to me," Shale said, "and Vlad has been a wonderful mentor, teaching not only dance but invaluable skills that will serve me in life."

Vlad said that "Shale is a very dedicated young man who has a passion for his art... He definitely has a bright future ahead of him."

When not dancing, Shale spends time with his family, which includes two older brothers, Max and Jared. "I have two dogs, Ruby and Scotch, whom I love," Shale said.

"Kvelling is an understatement in describing Shale," Wagman said. "When I watch my son dance, I am moved and can't help but feel his energy radiating, as I know that he is doing what he loves and what makes him happy. You can see and feel Shale's entire heart and soul poured into his dance."

Shale is a Grade 6 student at the Claude Watson School for the Arts, where his favourite subjects are visual arts and drama.

"Dance is Shale's passion, and the dedication he has put into his craft is very obvious," said the school's principal, Michael Byrne. "Even moments outside at recess are most often spent perfecting a specific movement. The entire Claude Watson community is cheering for Shale on Canada's Got Talent."

Inspired by dancers Mikhail Baryshnikov, Friedemann Vogel and Alex Wong, Shale aspires to study ballet at the Julliard School in New York and one day open up his own dance studio.

PLAYWRITING CONTEST WINNER RECEIVES SHORT STORY PRIZE

Daniel Karasik, a 25-year-old native of Thornhill, Ont., has been named winner of the CBC Short Story Prize. Karasik's story, Mine, was selected from a field of more than 3,750 submissions.

Karasik is to receive $6,000 from the Canada Council for the Arts, and his story is being published in enRoute magazine. He will also receive a two-week residency at the Banff Centre's Leighton Artists' Colony. Shelagh Rogers interviewed him last week on her CBC Radio show The Next Chapter.

Remarkably, Karasik was the playwright who won the 2011 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition for his play Haunted. The play is to receive a staged reading at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on Tuesday, April 10, 8 p.m. (416-924-6211, ext. 606)

He has won numerous other awards for plays that have been seen in Toronto, New York, and Germany. His latest, The Innocents, is at the Tarragon Theatre Studio April 26 to May 13. He also recently completed a first novel, which has also received acclaim by way of the Alta Lind Cook Prize and the Norma Epstein National Literary Award.

Jurors for the CBC short story prize are Peter Behrens, Michael Winter and Alison Pick, whose 2010 novel, Far to Go, won the Stan and Helen Vine Canadian Jewish Book Award for fiction.

Names in the News: Marla Lukofsky, a 56-year-old Toronto comedian who used to perform the story of The Wizard of Oz in one minute, has turned to more serious fare over the past decade since becoming a breast cancer survivor who underwent difficult chemotherapy treatment. She still keeps them laughing, but now adds a modicum of tears and sadness to her performances. Audiences are deeply and sometimes profoundly moved. Lukofsky, who lives in the Eglinton-Spadina area, recently drew standing ovations when she performed her show, I'm Still Here… and So Is My Hair! recently at Bayview Secondary School. The Toronto Star lauded her "lightning quick comic timing." She performs the show again at Rouge Woods Community Centre, 110 Shirley Dr., Richmond Hill, Wednesday, April 18, 8 p.m. www.marlalukofsky.com

Group celebrates Yiddish language and culture

Rena Godfrey
Special to The CJN

Growing up in Toronto in the early 1960s, I would frequently hear my parents converse in Yiddish when they didn't want me to know what they were saying.

Before long, I was able to understand a word or two, when it became obvious that the conversation was about my naughty antics. Although annoyed at my parents, I was still captivated with the spirited tone of the Yiddish language, especially when my father told off-colour jokes to his friends. I was even more intrigued when often reminded that Yiddish is considered a dying language.

Now, almost 40 years later, over a cup of coffee and a shtickel (piece) of cake with Helen Smolkin, president of Friends of Yiddish (FOY), I was happy to learn that Yiddish is still thriving in the 21st century.

"What gives me naches is when we have a good turnout at our events," says Smolkin.

FOY is a Toronto club that celebrates the language and culture of all things Yiddish, offering year-round programming of lectures, concerts, film screenings, sing-along sessions and holiday-themed parties for close to 200 members, as well as non-members, who are also welcome. The programs, which Smolkin plans with her board, are usually held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

But you don't have to be a Yiddish speaker to join in on the fun. As comically described in their bright yellow brochure, FOY is open to people of all ages and Yiddish-speaking abilities. "Sometimes we almost tzebrech di tzeyn [we break our teeth] as we try speaking Yiddish, and we can't always find the right word. We laugh a lot too… sometimes so hard, we can't speak any language!"

Smolkin adds that there's always a nosh and coffee provided at each event, as well as a chance to win a door prize.

Not only does Smolkin possess an enduring love for Yiddish, which she credits to being raised in a Yiddish-speaking home, but she is also knowledgeable about and supportive of the many activities focused on Jewish/Yiddish culture, here in Toronto and across the globe.

Some of FOY's past events were launched in partnership with other organizations, including the Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Workmen's Circle, Holocaust Education Week and the Jewish Book Fair.

Smolkin is a longtime supporter of the Ashkenaz Festival, the largest Jewish cultural event in Canada, and she wouldn't dare miss KlezKanada's Laurentian Retreat in the summer, Canada's largest annual festival of Jewish and Yiddish culture and arts. Smolkin is also on the board of the International Association of Yiddish Clubs (IAYC), an umbrella organization that connects Yiddish clubs worldwide, including FOY.

Although Smolkin is only too happy to mention other Yiddish-focused events in the local Yiddish scene, such as the Yiddish Vinkl (www.yiddishvinkl.com), a group that meets monthly at Free Times Café on College Street in Toronto, to hear a guest speaker and enjoy a buffet lunch complete with latkes and blintzes, she beams when discussing the future of FOY.

"People say Yiddish is a dying language – it is not. At our events, you are surrounded by people with a passion and love for Yiddishkeit," she says.

Experiencing a growth in membership, FOY also hopes to attract younger members to its organization.

To ensure that the Yiddish legacy continues in Toronto for generations to come, FOY has created the Friends of Yiddish Endowment Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, offering scholarships for candidates of all ages who want to study Yiddish.

FOY's touching words about the need to preserve Yiddish culture are noted in the foundation's 2010 Book of Life: "We talk about the golden chain and the links that intertwine creating a beautiful expression of our Jewish identity. Yiddish is a piece of that cultural link that is the chain of Jewish life. It is our hope that this endowment will create the programs and provide the education that will preserve this magnificent culture."

FOY will be partnering with Temple Sinai Congregation on April 15 to present A Polyphonic Canvas, an afternoon multimedia experience of music, art and narrative on the life of artist Marc Chagall.

For information about Friends of Yiddish, visit www.jewishtoronto.net, e-mail Yiddish18@yahoo.ca or call Merle at 905-707-0470.

Playwright wins CBC short story competition

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

Playwright and actor Daniel Karasik won the grand prize in CBC's short story competition last week.

"I found it very hard to process," Karasik said of his win. "I was very excited and also kind of overwhelmed."

His award-winning story is called Mine, and Karasik describes it as exploring the themes of love, fidelity and devotion.

He started writing the story when he was in Israel, travelling and studying at an egalitarian yeshiva. He had just finished a semi-autobiographical story, and he wanted to try writing from a different perspective.

"I was interested in imagining my way into the minds and hearts of this older couple," he said. "What does it mean to be faithful to somebody and to be devoted to somebody?"

Daniel Karasik

The couple in the story are Jewish, as are many of the characters in his stories. He said it's easier for him to write from within his own world.

"If you're going so far afield that you have to fill in all those sociological details with research or guesswork, I think you're less able to focus on the emotional and dramatic heart or core of the story you're writing," he said.

Though he began writing the story in Israel, he finished it in Paris, while visiting a friend he had met in Israel. In Paris, he said he found himself able to decompress and just write.

"At the risk of sounding heavily pretentious, I think the work I did in Paris, I remain quite happy with a lot of it," he said, adding that he thinks it's not so much that the city inspired him but rather his frame of mind while he was there.

Karasik, 25, who's from Thornhill, Ont., has won several awards. Most recently, he was the winner of the Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition for his play Haunted.

The CBC prize comes with a $6,000 award and a two-week residency at the Banff Centre's Leighton Artists' Colony in Alberta.

He said he's not quite sure what he'll write in Banff.

"It's possible I'll write a bunch of poems... or it could just be I'll have the opportunity to continue in a slightly more focused manner on what I'm working on otherwise," he said.

Right now, he's working on a poetry collection that's slated for release next spring. He's also in the middle of writing a novel, which he said couldn't be more different from the themes he explored in Mine.

"It's an exuberant, funny comic novel about young people in Toronto, and ambition and sex," he said.

One of Karasik's plays, The Innocents, is opening in Toronto at the Tarragon Theatre Studio on April 26. The story is about a young wunderkind Jewish lawyer from Thornhill and his quarter-life crisis. The Innocents was presented in New York and is currently being produced in Mainz, Germany. The Toronto run, until May 13, will feature a new version of the story.

For more information about The Innocents, visit www.tangoco.net. To read Mine, go to the CBC website or http://bit.ly/zGQqvL.

New state-of-the-art facility attests to Sutton Group Admiral's record growth

Muray Goldkind
Broker of Record

This is one company that doesn't just talk about growth; it "walks the walk" with an ever-increasing number of agents and brokers and an ever-expanding level of service.

Sutton Group-Admiral Realty Inc., Brokerage and the Goldkinds are especially proud of their new state-of-the-art 15,000 square foot facility, opening soon on Centre St. in Thornhill. It will provide additional cutting-edge services and facilities that Admiral agents need to further enhance the top-drawer service they give their clients.

This is the Sutton Group Admiral formula in action: maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents and brokers.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team — now over 250 agents and brokers — has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to further its presence in the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Broker of Record Murray Goldkind prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol Goldkind, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Peres likens Ben-Gurion to a latter-day Moses

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Shimon Peres, the current president of Israel, began working for David Ben-Gurion – Israel's first prime minister – in 1952. Having appointed Peres director-general of the Ministry of Defence when he was only 24 years old, Ben-Gurion obviously thought highly of him.

Ben-Gurion's faith in his protégé paid dividends as Peres went on to assume the most important positions, including the post of prime minister, in a succession of Israeli governments.

Ben-Gurion's admiration of Peres' talents was consistently reciprocated by Peres, one of his most loyal aides. Now in Ben-Gurion: A Political Life (Nextbook), a biography written in association with Israeli journalist David Landau, Peres adds yet more layers to this mutual admiration society.

Peres' sympathies are evident in the introduction, when he describes his mentor as a pragmatic visionary and compares him to George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. To Peres, Ben-Gurion, who died in 1973, was not only an emblem of the energy that created Israel, but a symbol of the leadership the country needs today "to find its way to peace and security."

In this illuminating biography, Peres traces the arc of Ben-Gurion's career as a Zionist functionary in Palestine and as a leader in the newly created State of Israel.

Ben-Gurion arrived in Jaffa from eastern Europe in 1906, when Palestine was still an underdeveloped Ottoman colony and the Zionist project was still in some doubt.

A Labour Zionist, he flirted with communism, but his Bolshevik leanings were forever laid to rest after a visit to the Soviet Union in 1923. A man of ideas who devoured books, he was so consumed by his official duties that he was an absentee father, his daughter recalled as an adult.

Under his leadership, the Histadrut labour union assumed great importance, while the Jewish Agency led the fight for immigration and independence and became a shadow Jewish government during the British colonial era.

A realist, Ben-Gurion warned against the illusion, prevalent in some Zionist circles, that Palestine was an "empty" land, devoid of Arabs who sought self-determination. "We do not dream of denying them that right or diminishing it," he said.

When 1930s Palestine was exploding in violence, Ben-Gurion called for a policy of havlaga, or restraint, in responding to Arab terrorism.

In common with mainstream Zionist philosophy, Ben-Gurion opposed the 1939 British White Paper, which restricted immigration at a time when fascism was driving Jews out of Europe.

But after Britain declared war on Nazi Germany, Ben-Gurion ordered the Haganah to stop attacks on British forces in Palestine and coined a now-famous slogan: "We must help the British in their war as though there were no White Paper, and we must resist the White Paper as though there were no war."

Unlike Zionist Revisionists, he accepted the concept of partitioning the land. Ben-Gurion's decision to embrace partition, Peres observes, was "a historic act of political wisdom whose logic is as cogent today as it was then."

As incredible as it may sound today, a number of Zionist leaders, notably Golda Meir and Meir Yaari, opposed the 1947 United Nations partition plan. Ben-Gurion disagreed, saying the Zionist movement would not be able to bring in Jewish immigrants in the absence of a sovereign state.

As war in Palestine loomed, he ordered the Haganah to modernize itself and dispatched emissaries to Europe and the United States to scour for weapons. He knew that Jewish statehood was not merely dependent on UN resolutions.

On the eve of Israeli statehood in May 1948, the future justice minister, Pinhas Rosen, argued there could be no declaration of independence unless Israel's borders were defined. Ben-Gurion challenged Rosen's logic: "We should say nothing about them because we don't know what they will be."

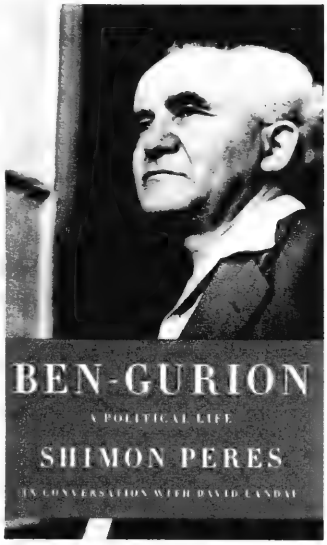
In hindsight, Ben-Gurion was right. During the war, Israeli forces captured land that the 1947 resolution had allotted to a Palestinian state. Israel was thus established in 78 per cent rather than in 56 per cent of what had been Palestine.

According to Peres, Ben-Gurion was not in favour of expelling Arabs from Palestine. "On the contrary, during the war I heard him speak in condemnation of this practice," Peres writes.

However, Ben-Gurion came out against the return of Palestinian Arabs to Israeli territory after 1949. Nonetheless, under a family reunification plan, Israel permitted close to 200,000 Arabs to return over the subsequent decades.

Although Peres strives to portray Ben-Gurion as something of a dove before and during the 1948 war, he discloses that the Old Man ordered the army to seize the southern part of the West Bank so that it could be attached to the northern Negev. The majority of his ministers objected, prompting Ben-Gurion to denounce their position as a bechiya ledorot (a cause for sobbing for generations).

Ben-Gurion's Mapai party won a plurality of 46 per cent of the seats in the Knesset in Israel's first election. Armed with this mandate, he devoted himself to encouraging unfettered immigration, a policy to which some of his ministers objected. But he pressed ahead and in a four-year period from 1949 onward, 686,748 immigrants arrived, more than the original Jewish population of the state.



The rising tension between Israel and Egypt in the mid-1950s is the subject of an intriguing chapter.

With Israel carrying out retaliatory raids in response to Arab terrorism, he and Moshe Sharett, the prime minister, clashed over tactics and strategy. Ben-Gurion, temporarily the defence minister, proposed that Israel should conquer the Gaza Strip. Sharett demurred, as did most of the other cabinet ministers.

Egged on by Moshe Dayan, the chief of staff, Ben-Gurion returned with a still bolder proposal: the capture of the Strait of Tiran, which Egypt had barred to Israeli shipping. Here, too, he was blocked by cabinet colleagues.

In the wake of the Six Day War, Ben-Gurion urged Israel to withdraw from all newly conquered territories except eastern Jerusalem and the Golan Heights, Peres says. "His essential worldview never changed. He always held that not pursuing peace was immoral, and that ruling over another nation was immoral."

Comparing Ben-Gurion to Winston Churchill and Charles de Gaulle, Peres likens him to a latter-day Moses, a shepherd to his people. "He led them across the desert toward the promised land."

Peres' description smacks of hagiography, but he can be forgiven for his effusiveness. Ben-Gurion, a leader of conviction and a man of action, guided Israel to nationhood against all odds, built and populated the country and died in the knowledge that his achievements remain unassailable.

Israeli captures world windsurfing championship

Rami Hipsh
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Inclement weather forced the cancellation of the final day of races at the RS:X World Windsurfing Championships in Cadiz, Spain, last month, leaving Israel's Lee Korzits in first place.

Korzits was four points clear of Poland's Zofia Klepacka when the races were stopped.

"I'm proud to again be in the highest place in the world," a beaming Korzits said after being crowned world champion for the third time. "Now I will concentrate on my primary goal – London."

Soon she was fielding a series of congratulatory phone calls from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Culture and Sports Minister Limor Livnat, sports officials, friends and family. "I'm just happy to represent the country and hear the support I'm getting," she said.

Korzits finished the competition with 17 negative points, four fewer than her friend and rival Klepacka, who was runner-up last year as well. Italian Alessandra Sensini, 42, finished third. Israel's Maayan Davidovich finished eighth.

"It's a great feeling that I'm still not used to," Korzits said. "It was one of the most difficult tournaments I've raced in, with really strong winds. My body is covered in bruises. There is a payoff for all the hard work I've put in."

Korzits, who turned 28 last week, was returning to the site of her first world title nine years ago. "It's one of the best things I could ask for on my birthday," she said. "I really want to succeed in London. I hope I'll go there at the top of my form. That's the real target, without a doubt."

Many observers called the title – her second in succession – a tribute to her mental strength, noting she will need plenty of that as she travels to the Olympic Games in London later this year as Israel's greatest medal chance. Her previous appearance in the Olympics, in Athens in 2004, ended with a disappointing 13th place in the final rankings. But this time Korzits comes armed with experience and more maturity.

"This was a tremendous achievement, but the Olympics are a different story," warned Yehuda Mayan, head of the Israel Sailing Association. "The conditions will be different and the course will be longer, but she's certainly a [medal] candidate."

If winds in London will be strong, it would improve Korzits' chances, as she is considered a heavy windsurfer, as is her training partner, Klepacka.

Israel's male windsurfers have yet to qualify for London. Nimrod Mashiah finished the competition in sixth place, while his rival, Shahar Zubari, placed ninth overall after the final day of men's races was also cancelled.

The pair will have to wait until the fourth and final tournament in which they can achieve the Olympics qualification criterion, in the Netherlands in May.

Zubari, who represented Israel at the previous two Games, will have to take first or second place if he is to leapfrog Mashiah and book his ticket for London. A bronze will suffice for Mashiah.

Longstanding soccer academy changes its name

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

After more than 30 years, the Maccabi Toronto Soccer Academy is undergoing a name change. The organization founded and operated by Martin Scott since 1980 is now known as King David's Stars Academy.

The name change coincided with the announcement of a new partnership with Israeli soccer club Beitar Jerusalem. The arrangement will see King David's Stars Academy "serve as official and exclusive Canadian talent development" for the Israeli premier division team, said Scott.

Toronto-area youngsters will continue to be offered high-level coaching and development programs, along with competition in youth and elite soccer leagues, Scott stated. During the summer, King David's Stars players will compete in the Soccer Academy Alliance Canada (SAAC) League, while older kids will play in other outdoor leagues. The outdoor schedule will overlap with the winter program, in which Stars teams will head indoors for games at either the Downsview Park Youth Soccer League or the Toronto Futsal Association.

Scott said he is in the process of contacting 90 players currently enrolled in Maccabi Toronto Soccer Academy programs and informing them of the name change. In addition, hundreds more on the group's mailing list are being told of the shift. Some 350 kids have been trained at the academy over the last few years, he said.

Youngster enrolled in the academy's programs will benefit from high-level coaching and tough competition. Boris Krimus, who has extensive coaching experience in Israel and Canada, will serve as head coach and technical director. Other coaches include Izzy EidnDor, Alon Reef, a former Israeli national player, Dejan Vugrincic, a former Serbian national and Raffi Fell, as well as himself, Scott said.

"Our focus is on technical development," said Krimus "We identify areas of improvement, correct, encourage and celebrate each child's evolution. We build character and leadership as much as teach soccer. The environment is disciplined but nurturing."

If they're good enough, they will have the opportunity later in their careers to try out for Beitar.

Few Canadians have played in Israeli professional leagues, but Scott said several Maccabi Toronto alumni have tried out, some successfully, including Shmuel Hazan, Ilya Orlov and Alon Badat.

The Maccabi Toronto Soccer Academy is not related to Maccabi Canada, which is a separate organization affiliated with the Maccabi World Union and which recruits players to represent Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

'Um... a present? Is it ticking?'

"There's so much to do!" Meir sings happily, while flying from a pot to a pan like a hyperactive Peter Pan.

I gaze at him skeptically. It's the fifth year that we're having people over for leil haseder. In Israel, our extended family sat around our seder table, including eight siblings – with the fair share of eight to Meir and none to me. By the way, I didn't get along with all eight of them.

Last year, we invited seven people. This is how it went.

Rina is a very nice and warm woman. Rumour has it that she stole my potential job at a desirable Jewish institute. She comes with her very, very shy husband. Nobody knows his name.

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

Rina: Hey, Nina! You look amazing! Have you lost some weight? I'm kidding. Of course, you haven't. Otherwise it wouldn't be our chubby, cutie, little Nina anymore! Brought you a present!

Me: Um... a present? Is it ticking?

Rina: Oh, you! (Looks around) I see you invited Nancy (Rina's shy husband smiles all of a sudden). I so hope she'll finally fall!

Me: Fall?

Rina: Fall in love! I mean, she's almost, I don't know how old, and still single.

Nancy is an adorable free spirit who's not self-conscious when it comes to attempting to steal other women's husbands, mainly mine.

Nancy (ignores me): Meir! You look amazing tonight. Again, you cooked all by yourself? No help? Nina (yet still not looking at me), where can I find me a husband like that?

Me: Try the lost and found.

Garry (thank God) enters with his wife. He's a smart, charming man who once borrowed a huge amount of money from us. We've invited him over for the last five years in hope that he'll finally remember to return it.

Garry: So, Meir, have you thought about new investments? Say, why not invest in my new invention? It's still a secret but, hey, we're among friends here. How 'bout a mechanical exorcist? Huh? Huh? I got rid of my two former wives this way.

Meir (warmly): I'll let you know.

Finally, Sharon and Mike arrive, a calm couple that made the intelligence decision not to have children.

Mike: Nina, have you thought about giving your kids up for adoption yet?

Me (apologetically): See, I was busy. Plus the thing is, we grow attached to them, so not this year, sorry.

Sharon: So at least send them to school far away. Mike's nephews are at this posh dorm in England, which Prince William's servant's friend once considered!

Me: I promise to think about it.

And so we sat at the table, smiling at one another. I know, some were trying to steal money, jobs and husbands, yet that's what made it so familiar and homey! Gosh, how I miss our dysfunctional families in Israel.

Happy Passover!

CANDIED WALNUT CHAROSET

1/4 c sugar • 1 1/2 tsp cinnamon • 1 c vegetable oil • 1 c walnut halves • 2 medium apples, peeled, cored, finely diced • 1/3 c sweet red wine

Line large baking sheet with parchment paper. In medium bowl, whisk together sugar and 1/2 teaspoon cinnamon. Set aside. In large skillet over moderately high heat, heat oil to 350°F. Stir-fry walnuts until golden brown, about 30 seconds, careful not to burn. Using slotted spoon, transfer walnuts from skillet to bowl containing sugar mixture. Toss walnuts in sugar, then spread on baking sheet. Cool 15 min., then chop roughly.

In large bowl, combine nuts, remaining 1 tsp cinnamon, apples, and wine. Store, covered, at room temperature until ready to serve.

Could it be me?

"And when you reap the harvest of your land, you shall not reap to the very corners of your field..."

The man standing in the shade, the panhandler, looks like you.

I move forward and realize it is you. Not wanting to shame you, or me, I lean up against a pole, cross my feet and look away.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

You see me. I expect you'll be ashamed and will run, but the opposite occurs. You're coming over to me, and while I didn't turn and rush away when I spotted you, I'm now wishing for a distraction. I'm hoping I'm asleep.

You shout my name. "Ha, Avrum, how are you doing?" almost as if we're at the supermarket bantering pointlessly about pomegranates.

I respond, "I'm good," in a cheery sort of way, but shrouded in "not really." I'm humiliated because I must be embarrassing you so badly. I'm so embarrassed. Your walls are gone. Build them up.

You were fine. We travelled to Israel together, and now you are an ani, a poor man. And the Torah has rules for how I am to respond to you: "Do not rob [hold back gifts from] the impoverished because he is impoverished." (Proverbs, 22)

You are "the most vulnerable."

What happened to you, David? Your children? Your home? The community? Your wife? Did she leave you? Did I fail you?

You're a step away from me now. I can see a square of earth matted in your hair. I smell you. You used to wear a distinctive cologne and we'd envy your tanned elegance.

But now your eyes have dimmed. You have whiskey on your breath like at our kiddush club. The rabbi wouldn't approve.

It was 8 a.m.

"David, I didn't know you were out here," I said, my voice weighted down by heartbreak. "I knew business was tough, but I hadn't heard about this," and I waved my hands at his plastic bags and stroller.

You didn't want to be distracted by my shock and curious despair. My intensity had no effect on your response. You stood carefree and broken. What happened next made me turn away in grief. You asked me for money. And while I jumped to hand you some, your new life booted me shamelessly in the shins. You are homeless, Dave, and only a short while ago, you supported our community's poor. You gave tzedakah. But you are "the stranger" now.

I had never been friends with a homeless person. The question of "could it be me?" had seemed so intellectual, like a warning to everyone else. What happened to you, David, that made it you? What was the turning point? When did love and community stop holding you together?

I handed you five $20 bills, and I believe I asked you to meet me at this spot tomorrow. In a lucid moment, the filmy transparency in your eyes disappeared and our sombre thoughts linked. We held our gaze and I felt an abundance of love, and I wasn't sure if it was for you, or for the poor, or for me.

I turned Dave's shirt collar down. I touched my hand to his cheek, to feel his skin, hoping it felt different from mine.

Ve'ahavta has launched the Could it be Me? campaign to help the homeless.

"....you shall leave them for the poor and the stranger. I am the Lord your God." (Leviticus, 19)

Building a Jewish library today

Essay by Norman Ravvin

In the fall I asked a group of graduate students to appraise their own libraries – to sit in front of them and consider the shelves of books as a kind of self-portrait. One student said he could not do this, since he was avidly getting rid of his books. We do seem to be in a getting-rid-of period, like that when people jettisoned their record collections, or unloaded sets of encyclopedias in favour of what was online. But the bulk of the students found a fascinating archeology mapping their progress in the arrangement of text books, literary works, volumes they'd bought abroad, had carried with them from childhood or discovered in university classes.

The key revelation was how closely certain books were tied to periods in their lives. I found their discoveries a great relief – young as they were, books still anchored most of them, serving as both an expression of adventure and discovery, and as a memory bank. By simply studying the organization of their library, waves of memory came crashing in on them.

A Jewish library today – whether private or public – should provoke the same rush of adventure and memory. What follows is a proposal for such a collection, a version of which readers may have beside them now. Where you are sitting will predict the necessary titles, to an extent. No doubt, the key texts of a Montreal library – so heavily focused on the city itself – are a lot less relevant in Vancouver or Mexico City. The books of our parents refine things further; and if you have children, who, in their own way, help choose the contents of a home's library, this will provide further leads.

This essay provides a modest proposal. It is in no way a proscriptive list, but a descriptive one, inclined toward books that give pleasure and surprise, with a light sprinkling of those that exist, for the most part, to edify. For this reason, creative works outnumber non-fictional ones.

Everyone has a different definition of what a "Jewish book" is. In Ruth Wisse's intensely proscriptive Modern Jewish Canon she asserts that "Modern Jewish literature is the repository of modern Jewish experience," and so, since Marcel Proust's literary work does not mine this, she excludes him from the canon.

Reading "in the Jewish tradition," Wisse claims, "has always merged into a communal discipline." This is true to an extent — in Montreal, book clubs are numerous and active, in which groups (of women for the most part) gather to discuss books they have assigned themselves to read.

To my mind – and this is especially true for writers – reading is also a private undertaking. It takes its lead from models offered at home or in school or at the public library. But a personal library is constructed gradually, to an extent haphazardly, its influences shifting with time. I would propose, too (and I don't think there's much scandal in this) that a Jewish library ought to mine modern experience, as it relates to Jews. From this position, you will not be surprised to find books below by non-Jews. Everything in the proposed library, however, represents the best and exemplary texts relevant to a contemporary Jewish reader's yearning after adventure and memory.

The list appears chronologically.

A Jewish Library Today

1. A good Chumash with detailed modern explanatory notes. The Soncino Chumash that was, for a long time, the bar mitzvah present of choice, is perfect for modern English-language readers who want to compare the Hebrew original to its translated version using influential commentaries.

2. A collection of the stories of I.L. Peretz or Sholem Aleichem. Apart from the pleasure these impart, and their usefulness for both adult and young readers, these writers convey the variety of prewar Jewish life in Poland and the Ukraine.

They counteract the romanticized stereotype of the shtetl, and reveal the basis of contemporary Jewish humour and story-telling. In them we find the root material of Woody Allen's comedy, Jerry Seinfeld's stand-up and I.B. Singer's fictional inventiveness.

3. Isaac Babel's Red Cavalry stories. Sometimes it's best to receive a book as it was first presented, and the Lionel Trilling edition, with Trilling's argument for Babel's relevance, is still remarkable in its impact. Babel's irony, his sensitive attention to Russian Jewish catastrophe in the revolutionary period, and his ability to straddle Jewish and non-Jewish worlds, are unparalleled. The hard edge of his prose is pure poetry.

4. Something by Dostoyevsky, because Babel's Russia makes more sense via a consideration of Russian writers he himself inherited. Demons, once called The Possessed in translation, is a gigantic, detailed portrait of the breakdown of Russian society, and the rise of left and anarchistic youth organizations, which appealed to many children of traditional Jewish parents. One can consider, too, the bizarre anecdote that Dostoyevsky claimed to have overcome his gambling mania after a late night ramble that ended before a stately synagogue.

5. The prewar central European experience is conveyed wonderfully in the now little read works of Stefan Zweig. Zweig was among the best-known Jewish writers of the interwar period, and his entanglement with German literature included his experience writing a late-'30s libretto with Richard Strauss, which Hitler ultimately banned. Zweig's The Typewriter Girl is a dark, moving novella, and his memoir, The World of Yesterday, conveys the darkest season in German Jewish culture.

6. Do people read Kafka as they once did? Certainly there was a time when every up-and-coming lover of literature worked their way through his stories, his posthumous and incomplete novels, even his diaries, with their musings on Jewishness, his failed love affairs and his dreary work at an insurance company. Maybe it is Amerika (now translated with the subtitle "The Missing Person") that connects us most vitally with the period in which Kafka imagined his own disappearance as a lost soul in a vast American city.

7. Just as Dostoyevsky helps us read Babel, we need other moderns to appreciate Kafka's era. Why not Joyce's portrayal, in Ulysses, of the day-long rambles of his Jewish-Irish Leopold Bloom? This masterwork, for a number of decades, seemed to sum up the entanglement of Jewish and non-Jewish culture in the postwar world.

8. Certainly, World War II looms over any contemporary Jewish library. Writers offer us the world before; the catastrophe itself; and the aftermath. A writer who links the first two in dramatic ways is Bruno Schulz.

Schulz was part of Poland's interwar modernist literary explosion, a compatriot of key figures such as Witold Gombrowicz and Ignacy Witkiewicz. His two slim volumes of autobiographical fiction are titled Cinnamon Shops and Sanatorium Under the Sign of the Hourglass. They are early magical realist myth about the Polish-Jewish oil town of Drogobych. Penguin recently released a collected Schulz with an excellent introduction by David Goldfarb.

9. The immediate moment in Poland before the war is brought home, as in no other book, by S.Y. Agnon's A Guest for the Night.

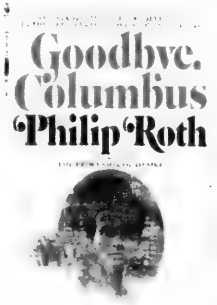
10. Of the war years there is too much to choose from. But the steady, honest, revealing works include: Michal Glowinski's The Black Seasons, about the Warsaw ghetto and the author's time spent hiding in a convent in the Polish countryside; Primo Levi's succinct Survival in Auschwitz; the wartime diaries of Emanuel Ringelblum and Janusz Korczak; Art Spiegelman's Maus; Vasily Grossman's dispatches, collected in A Writer at War.

11. Chava Rosenfarb's trilogy, The Tree of Life, written in Yiddish and published in English a number of years after the war, depicts prewar and wartime Lodz and the cultural and political undertakings of intellectuals in the Lodz ghetto.

12. Saul Bellow's early novel The Victim surveys the American scene in the postwar period.

13. I.B.Singer's stories and his early novel The Family Moskat mark the movement of a key Yiddish writer into the American mainstream. A later work that tackles the experience of survivors in America, in Singer's idiosyncratic way, is Enemies, a Love Story.

14. A book that has, on many fronts, been chased from Jewish libraries is Hannah Arendt's Eichmann in Jerusalem. Appearing first in successive issues of The New Yorker, Arendt's study captures a shift in Jewish attention toward Israeli experience, the rise of Holocaust education, and a consideration of ethics and politics after the Nazi catastrophe.



15. Philip Roth is the writer who captures, most succinctly and with great humour, the new social opportunities available to North American Jews in the 1950s. His 1959 novella, Goodbye, Columbus, is a heartfelt, even elegiac portrait of suburban New Jersey. The stories often included with it –Eli, the Fanatic, The Conversion of the Jews– are equally dark and funny and like nothing else available from this period. Roth's later work is a series of masterpieces and near-masterpieces. The Ghost Writer picks up where Goodbye, Columbus left off, with the first truly original take on the legacy of Anne Frank in America. The two recent novels that bear rereading are The Human Stain and American Pastoral.

16. Who else in American Jewish literature from this period insists on our attention? Allen Ginsberg, with his great, strange long poems Howl and Kaddish. J.D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye retains its sting and prophetic view of the increasing role of youth culture in the 1950s and'60s.

17. Which Canadians should we include in our proposed library? Surely Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz still rings true, whether it's read near the Main or overlooking the ocean on the west coast. Among Canadian precursors of Richler, and offering a contrasting take on Jewish identity in the 1930s, is Henry Kreisel's first novel, The Rich Man. Irving Layton's mid-1950s collections are an antidote, too, to the dominant Richler narrative. Published in 1959, but including poems from throughout the'50s, Layton's A Red Carpet for the Sun conveys his edgy, well-honed style.

18. After Layton, and with much more staying power, comes Leonard Cohen. His two novels, The Favourite Game and Beautiful Losers, are fine, strange, unique things. To best appreciate the effect of Cohen's early poems, the Selected Poems released by his Canadian publisher in 1968 offers a full variety of the work that made his reputation.

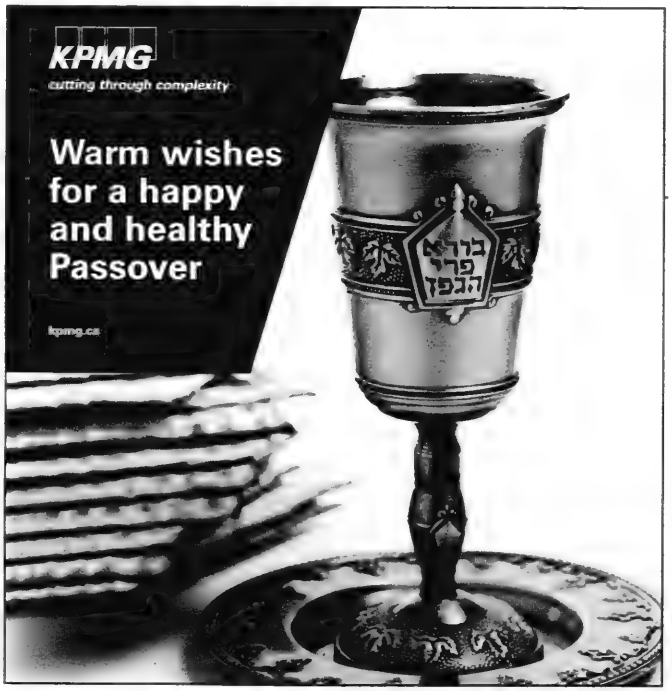
19. For the kids, and the parents too, Maurice Sendak's funny and wonderfully told early books: The Sign on Rosie's Door, Chicken Soup with Rice and Where the Wild Things Are.

20. The most worthy neglected Canadian writer of his era is Matt Cohen. His story collection Living On Water captures this country and the writing life, making use of Cohen's eye for the outsider. His posthumous memoir, Typing: A Life in 26 Keys, is a provocative summation of what it was like to be a Jewish writer on the scene as Canadian literary nationalism took hold. If anyone tells you that Toronto lacks its Jewish bard, Cohen's your answer.

21. The slim, tightly wound collections of Detroit-raised poet Philip Levine are full of unforgettable voices, portraits and elegiac memory pieces of an American youth. What Work Is, The Mercy and The Simple Truth are worthy of constant revisiting.

22. Because this list leans more toward pleasure and discovery than edification, it's short on non-fiction. The one indispensable book of Canadian Jewish history is Hesh Troper and Irving Abella's One Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe, 1933-1948. It changed the way Canadian Jews view this country's government and public culture.

Norman Ravvin has dedicated himself to making books in Canada since the 1980s, including a stint gluing and binding them at Toronto's Coach House Press. Since then he has worked as a writer of fiction, non-fiction, as an editor and a journalist. His recent publications are the novel The Joyful Child and the co-edited volume Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein.



The Cows of Pesach

Sylvia Solomon

My father told me this story many years ago, and given that it involves people, cows and intrigue, there's just no way I couldn't share it with you.

The setting is a work camp somewhere in Siberia during the Holocaust. Both of my parents had walked to Russia from their homes in Poland to escape from the Nazis, and because my father was supporting them by black-marketing – which evidently he wasn't so good at since he seemed to be arrested many times. So, there he was after being arrested for selling bras as ear muffs (yup, picture it: pull it over your head, stuff the cups with newspaper, and presto! your ears are warm).

It was sometime between 1940 and 1945. It was, of course, cold. Dad had been in the work camp for some months by the time Pesach was approaching. At that time, he was working in the ambulance corps; he'd volunteer – complete with past experience – for any work assignment that would get him out of the camp for part of the time. This way, he could continue to supplement life by what his wits could find about him.

Maintaining his Jewish lifestyle – even in a camp full of Jews – wasn't easy under the watching eye of his Russian captors. As so many others did, they just had to make the best of it. One evening, he was sitting talking with his comrades and they decided that they needed to do something special for Pesach. Baking a simulation of matzah was manageable; indeed it was pretty much all they could bake in their wind-swept, crowded barracks. But you can't just eat replica-matzah for eight days so, idea by idea, they hatched a plan that would have them all feasting on meat as they celebrated a freedom that was remote from their own day-to-day living.

A few days after they'd given birth to this rather outrageous plan, it was underway. My father's days were spent in the ambulance, driving out of the camp and into the countryside to pick up sick Russians who were in need of care. At least, that's what they were supposed to be doing. Seems that they spent quite a bit of time stopping at farms along the way, bartering for a few eggs here and some fresh milk there. On this particular day the stakes (or should I say steaks) were considerably higher. Now they were looking for a cow. Yup, a whole cow. An animal that could feed them all like princes for the few days of Pesach.

But how do you buy a cow without any money? Shirts. Lots and lots of shirts.

Back in the camp that evening, the collecting of shirts began. Each man who could, contributed one of the few items of clothing that he still had, and little by little, a sack or two (or maybe more) was filled. I don't remember exactly what my Dad told me a cow was worth in shirts, but I do remember that it was a number that astonished me.

The next time my father was out in the ambulance, they went back to the farmer they'd struck a deal with and – now that they knew just how many shirts they could gather – tried to make that deal a wee bit better. Of course there was considerable risk involved in doing this. Would the farmer decide that he'd be better off collecting some vodka from the guards at the work camp for tipping them off to this plan? Would he swindle them when it came to the actual exchange of animal for clothing? And then there was the big issue – how do you sneak a cow into a work camp?

Taking some chances, they struck a final deal and a date for the exchange – or at least an approximate date, since when they could get out of the camp with the ambulance wasn't really in their own control.

An aside for just a minute. Let me clarify what "ambulance" meant in a Siberian work camp. Not the vehicles we see driving through our streets today. Picture, instead, a cross between a jeep and a van, a big, heavy piece of equipment that could carry numerous injured or sick people at once. Something that could navigate the Siberian highways – to use that term very loosely. No windows. Drivers in the front. Passengers securely in the back.

Back to the story.

With sacks of shirts hidden in the back of the ambulance, my father and his friend went out to make a pickup. Of course, this was Step 1 of the plan because there was really nobody they had to pick up at all. Instead, they'd had the farmer communicate with the camp that there was a worker on his farm who was very sick with a high fever and vomiting who needed some medical attention before whatever disease he was suffering from spread through the district. So far so good.

When they arrived at the farm, the shirts were unloaded and counted. That was hurdle number 2, and with the farmer satisfied with his booty, they moved on to the trick-of-the-day, which was to load a live cow into the ambulance.

I can't remember all the details of how they got the cow into the van, mostly because as my father told me about it those many years ago, he was laughing so hard that the details became garbled. There was a ramp involved, and lots of pushing and cajoling. It took some time, but soon they had a rather subdued cow lying in the ambulance and they were heading back to camp.

The next challenge was to get into camp without having the guards at the gate look into the ambulance. Evidently the word "typhus" struck enough fear into everyone's heart on those cold Russian steppes that all they had to do was say they were transporting somebody who was very sick with typhus and they were waved through the gate.

Did they head to the hospital? No. Instead they drove the ambulance around to one of the barracks that was conveniently located in a spot that wasn't easy to see from the guard towers, and there the cow was walked off the van and into the waiting arms of a resident shochet, who'd also been arrested for some likely trumped-up reason. How lucky was that! I'm guessing there was at least one of whatever expert you needed living in that work camp, and likely more rabbis than you could put to good use.

By the time the ambulance was returned to its usual parking spot – with a little more bribery to the medical attendants who wouldn't inform the guards that no patient had been delivered that day – the cow had been sacrificed and cut into workable sized pieces for easy cooking over small fires.

They had replica wine, which they'd carefully aged from fermented potatoes. They had replica matzah. And they had real meat.

What a Passover that was. It was different from all other nights in more ways that the Haggadah recounts. As they sat together by evening candlelight and – from memory – retold the story of the Exodus, I'm guessing there were smiles on many faces as they tasted the succulent meat and remembered what freedom had once meant.

I'll be out buying my Pesach groceries before long, and each year, as I buy meat for the seder feast, I am reminded of my Dad's story about the cows of Passover. We often talk about this around our seder table, about the enormous courage and creativity and – yes, chutzpah – it took to survive the Holocaust. Thank you, father, for this legacy and this reminder of what our spirit as a people really is.

Hitler Defeated

To my mind, there are two kinds of people:
Those who are Holocaust survivors, and those who aren't.

To my mind, there are two kinds of survivors:
The ones who never talk about it, and the ones who cannot stop.

And then, it seems, there are two kinds of survivors who talk about it:
The ones who say "I am lucky" and the ones who say "Why me?"
Sometimes they might say both.

And then, there are two kinds of survivors who don't talk about it:
The ones who act like it is still happening and the ones who act like nothing ever happened.

There are also those who at first did not speak and, then, finally did.
And, it seems, those who initially spoke and then decided, for any or no reason, to stop.

But –
There is really only one kind of child of survivor:
The one who defeats Hitler every day, by way of her very existence.

Chunky Matzah

Mark Binder

Reb Stein, the baker of Chelm, stared at the thing in his oven. It looked like a slightly scorched white square block. He slid his metal paddle under it and put it on the cooling rack next to some of the other scorched white square blocks. He sighed. It was time to ask the rabbi.

He pulled on his overshoes and coat and stepped out into the raging snowstorm. As he pushed his way through the gale, feeling the cold sting of flakes on his face, he went over in his mind what he was going to say.

By the time he arrived at the synagogue, his teeth were chattering and he was muttering to himself. Reb Levitsky, the caretaker, led him to the stove in the rabbi's study to thaw his fingers and toes.

"Reb Stein," Rabbi Kibbitz began, but he didn't get further than that.

"I didn't do it!" Reb Stein shouted. "It's not my fault!" Melting ice was dripping from the brim of his hat onto the rabbi's stove, where it hissed and evaporated. The air was becoming thick.

"So? Nu?" the rabbi asked. "What?"

Reb Stein sighed. "The matzah. It's rising."

"What do you mean it's rising?" Rabbi Kibbitz's face grew puzzled. "If it's rising, it's not matzah. Matzah is supposed to commemorate..."

"I know!" screamed Reb Cantor. "But every single matzah I've baked this year isn't flat, it's a chunk!"

"So, what are you doing wrong?" Rabbi Kibbitz asked, innocently.

Reb Stein spun around and faced the rabbi, a look of madness in his eyes. He opened his mouth, bared his teeth, took in a breath and then started to sob. "I don't know! I've been baking matzah my whole life. It's not that difficult. Flour and water. You mix it up, you roll it flat, you hurry and put it into an incredibly hot oven, you watch to make sure it doesn't rise and then poof, you're done.

"Not this year. Every single matzah is coming out cubed!"

At last, Rabbi Kibbitz spoke. "Show me."

They bundled themselves warm and pushed the synagogue's door open. Reb Kimmelman was busy shovelling the path, but they made their way past him and trudged the short distance to the bakery.

Rather than taking Rabbi Kibbitz inside, where the ovens kept everything warm, Reb Stein led him around back. He slid a bolt, kicked more snow out of the way and yanked open a large door.

At first Rabbi Kibbitz could see very little inside. The snow had been very bright, and the few windows in the building were high up and concealed behind stacks and stacks of boxes.

"Here!" Reb Stein picked up one of the boxes and handed it to the chief rabbi.

"What's this?"

"It's matzah."

Rabbi Kibbitz peered. This thing, if you looked at it directly from the top, the sides or the bottom, it looked just like matzah. It was that magical combination of smooth and bumpy and white and dark that promised eight days of crunch and crumbs. Except matzah was supposed to be thin. This was thick – very, very thick.

Rabbi Kibbitz searched for something nice to say. "It's very light."

"Of course, it's light," Reb Stein said. "A piece of matzah doesn't weigh anything. The first one that came out of the oven, I thought maybe was hollow, so I dropped it on the ground. It didn't break. A few crumbs come off. I hit it with a hammer. It still didn't break. I had to use a saw to get a piece big enough to taste."

"What's it taste like?"

"It tastes like matzah," Reb Stein grumped. "It would be good with butter or chopped liver, except for the fact that it's so wide you can't put it in your mouth!"

Reb Stein's voice kept rising. "I start baking the matzah right after Passover. It keeps for a year. If I have too much, I can sell some of it and make a little extra money. Every week I make a batch. Every week it's the same thing. I tried different flour. I tried different temperatures.

"I tried watching. You know what happened? The matzah was flat, it was flat, it was flat, and then I blinked and poof! It's a square. This happened over and over again! I filled the whole warehouse. Passover is next week! What are we going to do?"

Just then Reb Kimmelman burst into the room.

"Rabbi Kibbitz! The ceiling on the synagogue! It's buckling under the weight of the snow."

Right behind him was Mrs. Chaipul. "Husband," she said. "the roof of my restaurant is beginning to collapse from the snow."

Reb Cantor huffed in after her. "My shop," he panted. "The snow. Too heavy."

They all stared at the rabbi. "What do we do?"

"Here," the rabbi said, handing Reb Kimmelman the chunk. He quickly took two more and gave them to his wife and the merchant. "Take these. Make columns. Use them to prop up the roofs."

"What is it?" Mrs. Chaipul asked.

"It's matzah," Reb Stein said.

"Matzah?" All three visitors spoke as one. "Matzah is supposed to be flat."

"We know!" shouted Reb Stein and Rabbi Kibbitz. "Now go!"

Soon, a matzah chunk brigade was formed from the bakery warehouse to every home and building in the village of Chelm.

The chunks were light and strong and they stacked well. Although the roofs sagged, they did not fall.

For the week before Passover, everyone in Chelm tiptoed around their matzah columns, careful not to disturb the architectural support.

Reb Stein was miserable. The roads were covered with snow. No supplies could possibly get through. Every time he looked at the tower of matzah holding up the roof of his bakery, he moaned, "It's not my fault!"

Then, on the morning before Passover, the villagers of Chelm awoke to warm sunlight, the sound of snow melting, and piles of neatly stacked, wafer-thin pieces of matzah in their homes, barns and places of business.

One after another they came to Reb Stein and thanked him for saving their property, and so conveniently delivering the matzah.

"All that pressure must have compressed it," Reb Stein said to Rabbi Kibbitz. "But is it kosher for Passover?"

The rabbi looked thoughtful. "Did you see it rise?"

"No. I watched carefully."

"And it's flat now?"

"Flattened." Reb Stein nodded. "All of it." He took a bite of one piece. "Crunchy, dry and bland, too."

Rabbi Kibbitz took a bite and chewed thoughtfully. "It's perfect. "

And then, grinning ear to ear, both friends began to laugh while the crumbs of matzah flew around the room and danced in the air before settling to the floor of the bakery like a thin layer of snow.

Words

It all began with words
Then with sticks
Then with stones
In the end what they found were Ashes
And mountains of bones
We are falling we are falling
Into a place called hell
We are calling we are calling
But no one hears the bell
Inside these chambers of gas
There is nowhere we can go
We are falling we are falling
Is everybody blind?
And the world slept while their souls wept
The world turned and somewhere on the other side far away
Their books were burned
How morbid were those days
When for them the sun simply could not smile
It grew darker still the world turned
And the naked bodies
Of innocent men women children and babies Burned
Six million Jews perished
Six million hopes dreams and possibilities
Shattered with the broken glass

Horah

Sheryl Halpern

It's Saturday night in mid-October, and the black hats are dancing. Outside, in the handicapped parking section of the mall, just the men, with a folk-singer playing electric guitar at top volume. The bright lights of the stores make them all moving silhouettes.

In the IGA, where the harried cashiers are pushing through the last orders of the day, nobody can quite believe it. Two lanky, pimply bag boys in white jackets are playing with the metal rollers on the grocery chute and peering out the windows into the dark.

"There a special holiday on now?"

"Think security's going to get them?"

"They're partying, they've got a live band."

"Like you could see them. Black suits, black everything."

One of the cashiers, the one ringing up Sarah's groceries, mutters, "I wish they'd make them move. It looks like some weird cult thing."

"Oh, I don't know," says the lady in back of Sarah. "I think they should be all lit up, so that people can watch. I went past them on my way in, and they look kind of cute with their beanies and old-fashioned hats, and even those furry things. They look like something out of Fiddler on the Roof."

Kippot, thinks Sarah. Homburgs, fedoras, shtreimls. Not cute. Sarah, who's gone in for eggs and ended up with $98 of frozen dinners, gourmet cheeses and pasta salads, says nothing out loud. She doesn't know of any special holiday, and she isn't letting on she knows anything else. She's wearing her Saturday morning jogging outfit, oversize white sweatshirt, black stirrup pants, and if she looks different from anybody else in the mall, she can't see it.

The dancers out there look straight out of a folk tale, what you can see of them. They're definitely Orthodox Jews out there, maybe Lubavitch. They come by the mall all the time and ask shoppers if they want to recite blessings. But she doesn't say this. She keeps her head down, counts her change and looks interested.

Since it's not too chilly, she goes outside to wait for her husband and stand by the car-order stand, and she hears the music even more clearly. "Ooray vanim li-vanechecha," sings the guitarist. Straight out of her Hebrew-school days. She can't remember what the words mean, but she knows them. The Orthodox go round and round in a never-ending horah, arms around shoulders, kicking legs.

She remembers an old boyfriend telling her that a horah worked best if everyone spun to match the Earth's rotation, clockwise. Or was it counterclockwise? And why? She remembers being part of a wild horah at a wedding. It rotored round and round, and almost whipped off the ground. Lift-off. She remembers not being sure whose arms, whose legs, whose laughs were whose. No thinking, no distinguishing, all... If you whirled faster and faster, wouldn't you all blur together, the dancers one unseeable dancer, one holy human ring? Suddenly, she wishes she could dance out there, even in the dark. But those were Orthodox men. They wouldn't even dance with their wives – who were at home, wearing wigs and long skirts, taking care of their 15 or so children, and definitely not dancing. Well...

"There's security," says the car-order boy, but security, in his blue uniform with the walkie-talkie, stands in the light to watch the dancing, the men and boys in their Homburgs and fedoras, and then goes inside the mall where it's warmer.

"I really don't know what all that's about," Sarah says, getting into the car after all the bags have been loaded into the trunk.

"I don't either, but you aren't invited," says her husband.

"Maybe someone got married, or it's the end of a study session."

"Probably just the end of Shabbat."

"Maybe if I put my hair under a black hat and wore a black double-breasted suit, I could dance with them?"

Her husband glances at her. "I don't think so."

But in her head, she's in the suit and fedora, joining the circle. A strong arm around one shoulder, her strong arm around another's, and she whirls round and round in the dark, celebrating.

For a capricious trice in the abbreviated aisle,
I behold alongside me eponymous ones:
King David, Rashi, and Ovadiah of Bartenura, a triumvirate of storied vintners

SMARTSET

Sinai 3300 Years Ago

The sweat pours down my brow.
My donkey groans, as I lift the heavy boards
Onto his back.

"Ridiculous, " I think to myself
As I shuffle my sandal-clad feet
Through the hot sand.
"Why do I need acacia wood in the desert?"

But Abba made me promise,
As he lay on his deathbed, when
The brutal marks of lashes
Oozed pus down his back.
"Today we are slaves, but one day we'll be free.
Take these boards with you
To build a house for the Lord
When you are freed from slavery.

My grandfather brought seeds from Canaan
When he proudly marched down to Egypt
With his white-haired father Jacob.
He planted the seeds and grew trees.
My father chopped down the trees and prepared the boards.

Acacia wood. Atzei Shittim, in my language.
I laugh as I think of the word Shittim.
It comes from the root of the word shtus.
Shtus means ridiculous,
Narishkeit in Mama Loshen.

How ridiculous to carry boards into the desert!
Will we ever build a home for the Lord
When we wander through this infernal heat?

A cloud appears. It shelters me from the heat.
I hear Moses calling.
"Please bring me your wood. Acacia wood.
I need Atzei shittim to build the Lord a home,
A mishkan, a dwelling place
With us in the desert.

When we build with atzei shittim, we remember that bending over backwards to make this world a better place
No matter how ridiculous and difficult the task,
Will cause the Lord to dwell with us."
I hand him the boards and wipe my eyes.

Montreal 2012

My hands tremble as I stroke his face.
From behind long, dark curly lashes
A pair of eyes stare at me blankly.
Then he turns his head away.

I think of baby Moses
Floating on a basket in the Nile.
Alone. With no one to take him in.
Basya, daughter of the King hugs him
And takes him into her palace.

The Jewish people are reedemed by Moshe, because Basya loved
A little, lonely boy.

Now it is my turn to take in A homeless Jewish child.
"We need foster parents
But no funding is available.
We can take him to a group home.
He can sing carols under the X-mas tree with the other little children.
We have present gaily wrapped
And lots of holiday food,"

How ridiculous of me to take in a child!
My children are all grown.
I can sleep in every morning
And vacation twice a year.
My floors sparkle with no one to scuff them.
My playroom , once filled with boisterous shouting
Has long become a silent den

I stroke the little boy's face once again.
I think of my ancestors carrying heavy boards
In the hot, dry desert
Accacia boards, shtus, narishkeit
The shtus of holiness from which the Lord's home was build.

"I'll take him." I mumble.
"I'll do it." I whisper.
"I'll take him home with me" I shout.
I will build a house for the Lord
By doing an act of kindness,
No matter how ridiculous it may seem.
I will raise this child in a Jewish home.

Shopping For Passover

Alvin Abram

I remember an experience I had a number of years ago shopping for Passover food. I dislike shopping – any kind of shopping. I'm a borderline klutz. I have a tendency to forget what I am supposed to buy and bring back items I wasn't asked to purchase. That's why Marilyn stopped asking me to go shopping with her.

But one year Marilyn asked if I would come Passover shopping with her. Not just regular Passover shopping, but after eight in the evening at what used to be Sunnybrook Market at a commercial plaza on the corner of Overbrook Place and Wilmington Avenue in Bathurst Manor. That evening was being billed as Midnight Madness. I don't know what motivated her to ask me to accompany her but, against my better judgment, I agreed to go.

When we approached the entrance to the store, Marilyn grabbed my arm and excitedly pointed to two deserted buggies tucked into each other. "Quick," she hissed, "grab one of those buggies." Her normally serene voice had a hint of panic.

I didn't understand why, but dutifully went for them anyway. As hard as I tried, I was unable to separate the two buggies. They were locked tighter than two dogs in heat.

"Never mind, never mind," she snapped, "I see another." She ran into the building and grabbed a lonely buggy that had just been discarded by its previous owner.

"Oh my God, all the good stuff will be gone!" she exclaimed, as she looked in the store at the many people quickly moving from aisle to aisle. "Follow me," she ordered as she plunged down the outside aisle into the noisy mass of clamouring people.

"Follow me!"

Before me, the narrow aisle was packed with bodies: tall, small, old, young, skinny and fat, and in the centre of the aisle sat several tables filled with an assortment of chocolates and other Passover sweets. On both sides of the tables, a slowly moving stream of humanity, packed tightly against the shelves, pushed over-sized buggies like gondolas in a narrow canal. As they shopped, they examined, smelled, squeezed and discussed the items in their hands. Moses could not have parted those bodies even with the help of divine intervention.

At that moment, I made a terrible mistake. I blinked in shock, and Marilyn disappeared. This was not the place for a non-aggressive person like me. Those behind me nudged me forward against my will. Hands crossed in front of my eyes as they stretched to the shelves or the tables, plucking selections from the mountain of goodies surrounding me. Several times my carriage got caught in someone else's, and then I was hit several times from behind by kamikaze shoppers.

Suddenly, a hand waved and Marilyn appeared ahead of me, beckoning. I zigged and zagged around the human obstacles, begged their pardon, and made my way to her. In her arms, Marilyn held the beginnings of her madness purchases. Her eyes were those of someone in a fight for her life.

I was rooted to the spot, enclosed on four sides by a wedge of bodies, as items flew into my buggy. Then, just as quickly as she had appeared, Marilyn disappeared again. I saw an opening and tried to manoeuvre forward. A heavily built woman approached me as if she were a snowplow, and the packed bodies parted to allow her access. I pulled in behind her, allowing her huge body to cleave a passage and, when we reached the bottom of the aisle, I tucked myself into a corner and waited for Marilyn to find me. She approached with her arms filled with an assortment of candies, marshmallows, chocolates and God-knows-what and unceremoniously dumped them into the buggy. Then she hurriedly turned the corner to the next aisle, filled with even more people than we had already passed.

Across from me, I spotted a deserted aisle that ran back toward the store entrance, and I quickly pushed my way into the aisle of calm. Others, seeing me enter, followed, only to discover the aisle contained no Passover items. As they tried to get back into the flow of people in the other aisles, they caused a lumberjack's nightmare. A wave of bodies floated by the entrance to the aisle, and I gazed at the bobbing heads from my position of safety, happy to be ignored by the passing madness that had overcome otherwise normal people.

A woman hurriedly passed. She stopped dead in front of me. Looked into my buggy and snatched an item lying amid the small mountain of goods.

"Where did you get this?" she demanded. She held the item up to my face as her eyes darted about, searching for it on a nearby shelf. I pointed back toward where Marilyn had been. She dropped the package and plunged back into the sea of bodies. I hovered protectively over my possessions. Now I was on guard.

Ten minutes passed. I was concerned Marilyn might have forgotten where I was parked, and reluctantly, I pushed my buggy back into the stream of people, each yelling louder than the other. The volume of noise from the hundreds squeezed into this ravine of merchandise was as loud as water cascading down Niagara Falls, and I could feel all the symptoms of a gigantic migraine coming.

On my right was a "dead spot" leading into a room behind strips of thick plastic. I parked the buggy outside the opening. I saw Marilyn. Excitedly, I raised my six-foot-three-inch height onto my toes, hoping she would see me over the bobbing heads of the multitude.

She did not.

Barrelling along, though, was someone I had known for 20 years. Hair disarranged, he had the look of someone obsessed and on a mission. He stopped not more than 15 feet from me and scooped something off the shelf, his eyes swinging like a pendulum. He was trying to focus on everything without giving up the ground he had staked out.

I shouted his name. "Stuart! Stuart!" He stared at me as if I were an invader, smiled, which for him can be an effort, and disappeared into another aisle in pursuit of more items on the piece of paper he had clutched in his hand.

An elderly lady tucked herself beside me. "This is meshuge," she said, caught her breath and quickly left.

Marilyn found me and dropped off her next load of contraband, disappearing without a word, to bob and weave in search of other items. Finally, my torture came to an end when Marilyn threw the last items into our bulging buggy and we forged ahead to the lines waiting for checkout. As I watched $300 change ownership, Marilyn informed me she wanted to go to another store, one not next door, but at the corner of Steeles and Bathurst. By now my migraine was having its own headache.

The next store luckily was relatively empty. Marilyn led me up one aisle and down another.

"One more thing," she said.

I breathed a sigh of relief.

"Finished!" Marilyn said, as she plunked the last container into the buggy. Relieved, I turned my buggy toward the checkout line.

Finally finished, we returned home. I had been lucky enough to add one box of mandelbrot and one box of coconut marshmallows to the list without Marilyn being aware. I settled myself comfortably in front of my computer, an open box of coconut marshmallows hidden under a pile of papers, when I heard Marilyn bellowing my name from the kitchen. She claimed four items were missing. I insisted I had seen them being packed. Marilyn repeated that they were missing. A search of the house and the car resulted in the return of my headache – not the missing items.

Cash register tape in one hand and my car keys in the other, Marilyn returned once again to the second store where the items had been supposedly purchased.

As a parting jab, I told her, "Try the buggy. I put it back in the rack in the parking lot."

I did not really believe she would find the lost items there, but a half an hour later, Marilyn returned with the missing four items. She had found them in the buggy, in the rack, by then jammed into a chain of many buggies and she had to get help to reach them.

Is there a moral to this tale?

No!

She said she would never ask me to shop with her again, but I don't believe her. She promised me that 30 years ago and didn't keep her word.

Happy & Healthy Passover

The Annual Spring Ball

Eleanor Kunigis Moidel

Eagerly, the trees awaited the day and evening of the annual spring ball. Spring had arrived, the days were longer, the skies were clearer. They readied themselves by lapping up the dew that surprised them each morning; they examined each other's branches and leaves wanting to know which changes to their friends had taken place during the arduous winter.

The saplings were so excited. They had heard about the annual spring ball and were looking forward to joining the older generations of trees, knowing that they would have to pay close attention to the rules of the dance, the dos and don'ts. Being spry and agile, the saplings bent to and fro with each little wind that came up. The older trees didn't move as quickly. Only their top branches and leaves swayed.

The grass beneath their roots started to grow new shoots, young blades, emerald green in colour, thin but straight. The birds could be heard in the distance. They were starting to return from their southern migration. Not all of them; just the birds who were anxious to resume their spring and summer abodes. The sky was now bluer, the clouds whiter and puffier than during the winter, the sun remaining longer during daytime hours.

The long-awaited evening finally arrived. Although the saplings were too anxious to start their dance, they knew that the older generation of trees entered the dance floor first. The younger ones watched as the older, more mature trees bowed to their partners in front of them. And then they started to dance, at first slowly, bending just at the top. Then they, the majestic oaks and exotic maple trees, picked up speed and were now bowing from just above their trunks. Their partners, young virginal birch trees dressed in white, followed their lead and at first curtsied just with their top leaves; then when their partners displayed more energy, they too curtsied from their trunks.

The music conductor was the wind. When it could hardly be felt, the branches and twigs barely moved. As the wind picked up speed, you could feel the coolness of the breeze. When the wind huffed and puffed the young trees and saplings were afraid that they would break. The music provided by the birds was mesmerizing: musical and thrilling. They had returned to this scene joyfully, not wanting to miss any of the dancers' steps. The younger trees couldn't contain themselves any longer and started to move and sway to the chirping of the birds' voices. Their partners took their examples and also started moving to the music of the robins, sparrows and even the crows. The older trees watched with pride. They were ready to relinquish their seniority and allow the younger generation to be first during the following round of dancing. Every blade of grass was happy; the clouds came down just a little lower to show their approval; the sun smiled warmly at the participants; the blue sky blushed a cool blue.

The assemblage was waiting for something else. Each year at the end of their ball, they all looked to the houses just beyond. They knew when to stand still and listen. What were they waiting for? They were attentively listening for the first "mah nishtanah halaylah hazeh."

Each year the congregation of trees listened and waited for the seders to begin. Their dancing had stopped, but they were waiting to hear the niggunim from the Haggadah. They were familiar with them and knew when to bow, curtsy and sway. When the sun left for the west, the moon took its place. It too shone. It too smiled, happy once again to participate at the first seder of the year; the stars twinkled and provided the path to the Passover homes. It was once again calm and peaceful. The night held mysteries anew.

I Miss

I miss that exotic atmosphere
Full of history and melancholy
As the flowers spread their bloom
Over the hills of Galilee.

I miss the golden orchards
And their alluring fragrance
As the last rays of sun
Glimmer between branches.

I miss the timeless sea
As it heaves against the shores,
Whispering ancient stories.
Redemption for a Jewish soul.

Chag Sameach!

From our family to yours, we wish you joy and many blessings at Passover and all throughout the year.

The Go-Between

Maurice Krystal

I was 13 years old when I first spent all day in shul for Yom Kippur with Dad. It was dark as we walked home. At intervals I could hear my stomach growl in hunger. It was the first time I was seriously fasting for the Day of Atonement. Dad stopped to tie a shoelace and I stopped beside him and waited. I knew even before he said anything that this was the moment for the reminder.

"When we get home, Mom will ask how you feel. You know how to answer?"

We had rehearsed it a number of times. I didn't want to get Dad in trouble.

"I'll say I feel pretty good. And when the food is served I won't eat too fast."

"If you eat too fast you'll get sick. And she might ask if you feel dizzy or your head aches. You will have to convince her that fasting and going to shul was your idea."

"It was my idea," I complained.

There were a whole number of scenarios I had to be prepared for, because religion was a very sensitive issue in our home. My parents argued almost nightly at the kitchen table after my brother and I were sent to bed.

His voice was like papery whispers while hers were gale storms of emotion. He eventually became quieter, disengaged and seemed to disappear.

I would only understand it much later, but even as a child, without reading any psychology books, I grasped the root of the conflict. The Holocaust affected my parents in different ways. As they searched for family survivors after the war, my mother lost her faith in God. "What sort of Creator would allow this?" she yelled. "What sort of religion encouraged followers to go to the slaughter like lambs?" she cried. Dad became more devout. There were no grandparents, only one uncle and one aunt left from two large families. For my father, it became an obsession that I continue the tradition so those who perished did not die in vain.

So I went with my father primarily out of guilt. I think I always supported the underdog. He needed help against an overbearing wife.

My religiosity, or the lack of it, has gone through many phases in my lifetime. During my teenage years I would agree with my mother: religion enslaved us to primitive superstitions. In my 20s, with philosophy courses under my belt, I became more tolerant but still drew the line at God and miracles.

Today, I see Judaism as part of my culture and a link to other Jews whose descendants experienced a common history. So in a way, I have completed the circle, because I think my Dad felt the same way.

The table had been set when we walked in the house. I could smell the cheese blintzes as soon as I walked through the front door. My mouth started watering like a leaky tap. I knew Mom would be watching my every move and I promised Dad to control myself. I followed Dad to the kitchen sink to wash my hands. I avoided looking at the food; I didn't trust my will power.

Seated at the kitchen table, Dad slowly cut the bread. Mom was unusually silent. Most of the talking was from Michael, my 10-year-old brother. He had wanted to go with us to shul, but was told he would have to wait another three years before he could attend the all-day services for Yom Kippur. He wanted to know what went on, he was impatient to grow up.

"What was the best part?" he asked me as he passed the plate of cheese blintzes.

I took three but then remembered myself and put one back.

"The best part? I guess that would be the blowing of the shofar."

"How many times do they blow it? How big is the ram's horn?"

My brother's eyes lit up. He was excited. Mother, on the other hand, was flushed and her lower lip twitched. I sensed danger. I cut a small piece of blintz and slowly put it in my mouth and chewed carefully. I could hear my stomach gurgle.

"They used a big black one." I stretched my arms some two feet wide. "It's curved, but about this big. During Rosh Hashanah it's played many times. The whole congregation yells out which notes to play. There's tekiah, shvarim... and some others I forget the name of. But for tonight, they blew it only once at the very end. What's the note called, Dad?"

But Dad was in a staring contest with Mom. We played staring contests in the schoolyard. The one who blinks first loses. I had never seen Dad stand up to her before. I heard the ticking clock on the wall – time froze. Michael was oblivious.

"What does it sound like? Do the walls shake?"

"Almost," I grinned. "Next year you will have to come with us to hear it for yourself. You don't have to fast until your bar mitzvah."

Mom pulled away and looked at me. I could see her eyes scrunch up and her face turn beet red.

"Tell your father," she began slowly, "tell him I won't let him corrupt the next one with superstition. Tell him he will only take him away from me over my dead body!"

She got up. A few minutes later, we heard our parents' bedroom door slam shut. The walls of the small apartment vibrated and the glasses in the cabinet tinkled together.

I looked at Dad. His eyes looked down at his plate with the blintzes and chopped egg. They seemed sad and tearful. After a few minutes of silence his shoulders rose and he faced his two sons and gave a sheepish grin.

"Eat," Dad said putting another forkful in his mouth. "Your mother has her views and on certain issues I have mine. She'll eventually calm down."

My mouth was watering and I took that third blintz back.

Celebration

Paul Philip Brown

The wind bit, whipping half-frozen snowflakes with surprising force against the skin of his face. Muttering silently to himself against the cold, he trudged the last few steps, touching his gloved hand to the mezuzah as he passed through the doorway.

Enveloped suddenly by the warmth of the synagogue foyer, he shivered momentarily, removed his coat and Muscovite hat, left them at the coat-check and strode purposefully toward the sanctuary. He removed the tallis from its bag, pronounced the blessing silently and draped it around his shoulders.

"Shabbat shalom, Tsavuah!"

Tsavuah was greeted warmly by his shul comrades as he settled into his usual place near the front of the sanctuary. Since they rarely saw one another during the week, they had much catching up to do on their weekly day of rest. For his part, in addition to the latest current events news, Tsavuah had several newly completed and prospective business deals he was itching to discuss, not to mention his son's recent acceptance into medical school. Not that he wanted to brag, of course, but wasn't it natural for him to want to trumpet Shimmy's success after the family had been faced with so much anxiety and uncertainty about his future? And, to be sure, his shul friends would have their own news to share as well.

"Did you hear the latest from Iran, Tsavuah? I saw the Globe and Mail this morning on the way over and the report said..."

"Listen to me, Ben. If you think that's bad, my brother just returned from a holiday in Israel and on the trip back, the plane was forced..."

"Shhhh! Gentlemen, please!" The trustee glared at them from the aisle, pointing to the open siddur in his hand. Tsavuah hadn't yet managed to take one from the low shelf on the back of the bench in front of him.

"Le'hodot lecha ule'yachedcha be' ahavah," intoned the chazzan as he gathered together the fringes on the four corners of his tallis into one hand in preparation for the recitation of the Shema, the central statement of God's oneness.

Now that the trustee had moved down the aisle, however, the trio resumed their conversation, certain that no judgmental eye was being cast upon them.

While engrossed thus in their personal and business affairs, all track of time lost, the Shabbat morning Shacharit service was concluding with the removal of the scroll of the Torah from the holy Ark.

"And Egypt shall know that I am the Eternal," chanted the reader some 30 minutes later, the sculpted silver yad, a miniature extension of his own hand, pointing at the Hebrew text of the Torah scroll.

"Can you believe what's been happening to the price of gold?" queried Tsavuah.

"Am I sorry I didn't listen to my broker last month," wailed Lou.

"And the Eternal said unto Moses, 'Go unto Pharaoh, and thou shalt say unto him, "The Eternal God of the Hebrews hath sent me unto thee saying, Send away my people, that they may serve me in the desert."'"

"There's nothing to choose between in this election," plainted Tsavuah in a half-hearted attempt at a whisper.

"And I will distinguish in that day the land of Goshen, in which my people dwell, that no insects shall be there, in order that thou mayest know that I am the Eternal in the midst of the earth."

"That's exactly what he said, Ben, if you can believe it."

"Some maven."

Scarcely controlled laughter. Faces turned, some glaring, most simply staring, among them the face of his son, Shimmy, seated with his friends several rows back.

At the end of the Musaf service, the rousing hymn of praise, Adon Olam, filled the sanctuary. Tsavuah joined in as he usually did, singing heartily.

"Let's be going, Shimmy," urged the father as they edged their way through the crowded foyer toward the doors. Tsavuah touched his hand to the mezuzah on the doorpost. An icy gust of wind greeted him, but the vibrant warmth of his voice was unmistakable.

"Ahhh!" Tsavuah Kadesh sighed deeply, with great satisfaction. "Thank God for the synagogue and for prayer, Shimmy. I feel so spiritually refreshed after a Shabbat morning in shul."

Wending their way home together, Shimmy was silent.

What is a faithful Jew

Rachel Mandel

What is this faith,
They say I've not known?
What is this faith?
I've not been shown.

This is what they say,
It means to be a faithful Jew.
Because, as they tell me,
There are things that one must do.

Among the most important,
One must belong to a good shul.
And by day the children must,
Attend a Hebrew school.

Light the candles, have a feast,
On Fridays for the Shabbos.
One must visit and rejoice,
With the Saftas and the Sabbas.

Only order kosher foods.
Only shop at kosher stores.
And on Passover you must,
Sit with feathers on the floors.

Recite the prayers each day,
They must be spoken in Hebrew.
In which you must be learned,
To be a faithful Jew.

I think about this long and hard,
And I offer no criticism,
Though I am inclined to disagree,
On the true meaning of Judaism.

More important than attending shul,
Is to keep a growing, open mind.
And attain other values learnt there,
Such as being tolerant and kind.
Teach our children not to gossip,
Not to spread lashen hora.
And at the start of each new day,
Give pennies for Tzadaka.

Praying doesn't have to be in Hebrew,
First what you're saying must have clarity.
Prayers need not come from a holy book,
So speak from your heart – all that matters is sincerity.

To embody the morals and the values,
Might be the most holy thing to do.
For I cannot think of anything better,
Than to be a faithful Jew.

Zion of Love

If ever you should grant me the chance,
I would efface the script of infidels from the tablet of your heart;
my shielding arms would enfold you,
as mountains surrounding Jerusalem;
my nibbling lips at your inviting earlobe would whisper a Knesset of sweet-nothings;
my guardian legs would enwrap you,
like Hinnom and Kidron round the Old City;
I would enter you as a Promised Land, till our lovescape flowed with milk and honey.

The things you collect – candy wrappers, tram tickets, ration cards, theatre posters, restaurant menus, invitations, photos, postcards, comedies, poems, accounts of a starving mother eating her dead child

On Sabbath eve, April 17 1942, Gestapo agents knock on the door of your close friend, statistician, Menakhem Linder. Nothing serious, they say. Just take a toothbrush and a change of clothing. Then just out of the car, they shoot him plus go back for fifty-one other Jews.
Why them why, why?

The claws tighten on your future. You and your team rush, fly, to create proofs of existence before the vanishing. Questionnaires, artifacts, essays on The Future of the Jews/TheJewish Woman/The Ghetto Street/Economics of the Ghetto

You have the children interviewed:
What does war mean to you?
Not eating till two in the afternoon... hunger tortures me... no work, just hunger...
I don't want to beg, so I smuggle... police put the barrel of a pistol to my head

Help, the life space is shrinking.
Lists, stats darkening the whiteness. You are the marker

May 5 - An invitation to a children's program at the Femina Theatre: "Spring Has Come"
June 6 - Shootings in Lida, Pabianice, Zdunska Wola and Krakow
July 14 - Invitation for the grand opening of a Hebrew-language preschool
July 18 - Invitation to Tagore's Postman, performed by Janusz Korczak's orphanage children

July 22: Start of the Great Deportation

The hawks are spotted in the forest.
Chik a dee dee dee dee dee dee dee.
Take cover or their talons will pierce your organs and break your bones

The small birds in the ghetto are being hunted down, trapped inventory, waiting to fill quotas of Jewish lives for deportation

Chik a dee dee dee dee dee dee dee.dee dee dee dee
They're blockading whole blocks, set for destruction... need to leave home quickly or I'll get shot... can't go home or I'll get shot... seized, if I wander the streets... one hour to pack my whole life into a 15-kilo bundle... Jewish police herding us into the wagons

The woman is taking her baby for a stroll. Needs to get some air or she'll go nuts.
Her street is clear. She tucks in her blouse, straightens her shoulders, pats her baby's cheek and moves forward. A coal wagon passes, piled up with elderly people, strangely silent in early mourning. No, it would never stop for her, impossible. The creaking force lands in front of her, swallows her up and her screams, leaving baby and carriage behind as sidewalk litter

- Hurry, to the trains, to the east, for resettlement, work. We promise you 3 kilos of bread and a kilo of marmalade.
- Bring me back, cry the notes flung from heartless trains

July 22 – 6,250 Jews deported
July 23 – 7,300 Jews deported
July 24 – 7,400 Jews deported
And so on until Sept 12

Not a single shot in protest. Not a single German killed. The only resistance, in the recording by you and your comrades, Lewin, Kaplan, Gorny and Opoczynski.

Hiding in apartments, hiding against walls outside, invisible, packing, moving, watching the wagons, worrying, panicking, and writing and writing, the writing endangering, the writing empowering, keeping the spirit open and receptive enough to bear witness to the experience, to ache, to see the loss, world crumbling, not to shut down in denial or suicide, to document the historic cry, to be the body of words immune to starvation and shooting

By September you witnessed the loss of more than 300,000 Jews.
You were a privileged slave with your work certificate from a ghetto carpentry shop. Yes, you helped save some intellectuals.
What did you do for the masses?

Lists for lists. You lived to make the lists of the taken and the takers, rows upon rows of markers, a cemetery of words. The ghetto is amputated; a quarter of the population remains

But you and your band captured it all. You saw the pillow, the doll, the brown pants, the brocade chair, the baby carriage, the orphans, all joined together as one crying out for their missing selves

Aug 3 – You had the first cache of the Oyneg Shabes Archive buried under a friend's school at 68 Nowolipki

1943

Jan 18 - The Nazis return to the ghetto to fill a quota of 8,000 Jews for deportation.

The captives set out without protest to the deportation point.

Jewish fighters suddenly spring out from the crowd. Joyful, grenades, clubs, steel pipes, sulfuric acid and the revolvers. Finally the hardness, the power, the thrust, the pounding, a small seed inside exploding. Jewish fighters, such crazed little creatures, flying from district to district, mobbing and piercing and shooting and shooting at the enemy, such risk in the trying, such release, finally freed from the mind of their elders – of hope of the future, of hope of life at any cost for self of hope of begging or buying help from others

The fight as a flock for an honourable death, the redeeming sacrifice for their people

Jan 18 -21 The human kill is stopped at 6,500

An account of this action is deposited in the Archive

Feb – You have the second part of the Archive buried in 2 aluminum milk cans under the same Borochov school building at 68 Nowolipki

Feb – You escape with Yehudis and Uri to a hideout, Krysia, on the Other Side, the Christian side

April 4 – A third part of the Archive is buried under 34 Swietojerska

March 7 - A lovers' quarrel between the Krysia's owner and his girlfriend leads to the betrayal of the occupants

You enter the list, arrested and jailed. Trapped chickadee is offered an escape, just for you, not your family

- Is death difficult, you ask, turning down the offer

March 9 - The residents of the Krysia bunker are shot, including Yehudis and Uri and you

Sept 1946 - Your first cache of documents is brought out of the earth. Birth of 10 tin boxes covered in clay, securely bound in string, 25,540 pages of materials

Dec 1950 - The second part emerges. 9,829 pages

The third one is waiting in the ground

- Who is Ringelblum?

You are the bird of humanity's captives, soaring high above and deep inside, sending out the warning,
the witness's cry,
flock attacked,
siren calls.
Then notes lengthening, commingling into melodies of sadness and continuity.

We breathe in your songs chick a dee dee dee, fee fee deedee deedee and fly again

Fascinating Images

Judith Shakar

A wind blows from the East
I hear its whistling nearby ...
An ancient refrain steals
Into my heart and breaks it.

I see before my eyes
A glorious Land,
A magnificent blue sky
And a shimmering setting sun.

Fascinating images light my mind,
Living alongside my days,
Lucid under my eyelids
Even in darkness of night.

And like the blossom that follows
The first breath of spring,
So in the warm bosom of my Land
I would emerge anew with joy and serenity.

And were I a little dove,
I would fly over the ocean,
Carrying in my beak an olive branch
Offering it to my people as a symbol of lasting peace.

Passover

Ron Cluteh

On Pesach, it is said, the home becomes a synagogue,
but not until after the endless tidying, cooking, and negotiating are complete, not until the hosts decide where to seat the sisters whose families don't get along or the brothers-in-law who had the falling out or the young cousin awkward in groups of more than two – then wondering for a terrified moment whom this year they forgot to include.

In the seders of my youth, famished elders made a virtue of mumbling the Passover story in thick Ashkenaz, short-shrifting the Haggadah Hebrew eager to arrive at the festive meal.
They seldom paused, as we now do, to illuminate the symbols adorning the sacred plate.

Thank God for the Four Questions.
Even the family leader fell hushed like everyone at the double long table, as the youngest, for once, escaped being shushed, and stood on a chair for a first performance
he had worded by heart.

Ah, the scent, the spirit,
the ruach of the occasion:
pungent red horseradish chrayn suffusing apple/walnut charoset, a mock mortar sealing two walls of brittle matzot as parched lips served as sounding bells for the minor chords and gutterals of the Hebrews' ancient tongues.
What magical effects, hunting the afikoman matzoh as Manischewitz or Carmel red wine tingled a still-developing brain
– any child could feel the prophet Elijah brush by to the proffered cup of wine, the sign that bedtime was long overdue.

To the unsympathetic, our yearly recitation of the Ten Plagues is the oldest grudge in the world.
Not so at the seder of my adult years where every portion on our collective plate has a name someone alive remembers in family blood:
the Holocaust, the Russian exodus, the release of the Falashas from the kingdom of Ethiopia, the freeing of American slaves, each hearkens back to the ancient revolt that forged a nation out of servitude, as Moses led his dispossessed through forty years of desert, torn between a golden calf and a God only visible in achingly brief pillars of smoke and fire, but who gave of himself to his people in a rain of heavenly manna and a parted sea of grief.

At this seder may our story compete with the daily demands of life.
Let food vie with song for pride of place in the spirit.
May the last of our blood to be spilled be an overturned glass of concord red on a tablecloth of finest linen stirring a frantic search for a mound of salt in the middle of this, our people's freedom and its great golden age.

For all that, for all that, I, the father, find my seat at the table's side, and I invite my cousin's wife, a fine teacher, to lead our family seder, "Order,"
I joke, "never having been my thing."
But all those rabbis' elderly eyes looking on – and I ask myself, how can I stand there holy?

A Song To Jerusalem

Marion Mazzaa

This special sky,
what else – just this sky.
I fade into myself, and fold away – take it all in as an olive tree spreading branches and roots into the earth of your body, past prayers that can be felt seeping through your breath, to where prayers speak to your white harp, your hills of dress –
I am in painted songs caressed by the filament of your beauty.
You are a mountain refuge for the heart, my eye.

How do I sing to you, Jerusalem?
You are just not anyone.
It's just the heart, and I have no reason to –
I'm not out, or in, or part –
It's just that the world bends gold across your city a few miles strong, and yet away, and neither stars, this child hope,
this peace burning in my breast, your songs of gold like an ocean shell around David's tower, seems real.

My eyes cannot fully ever understand your stones of white, your desert hills and the olive earth, or the birds by the Wailing Wall climbing with wings of unending prayer on high.
I am in your dream just like an olive tree.
In the points in my eyes, you are my branch of gold, my arm of light.
Your blanket of sky is the comfort to my head and the ground of your hidden fortress is the mattress for my back. Inside your roots,
I always dream I can hear the grass grow.

Shame

Tilya Gallay Helfield

A week or two after school started in September 1944, a new boy joined our class. He was small and thin with black eyes and enormous hands and feet dangling from skinny arms and legs that jerked like a marionette's on strings. I knew who he was. At dinner the night before my parents had discussed the arrival of the new rabbi and his family from Baltimore. The boy's name was Chaim, but when Mr. Furey, the principal, introduced him to the class, he pronounced it "Chame" as though it rhymed with shame.

Mr. Furey showed Chaim to his desk and he told him, "A gentleman removes his hat indoors, Chame."

Chaim sat down at his desk, but he didn't take off his skullcap.

"I said, take your hat off, Chame." Mr. Furey's face turned red, as it always did when he got angry.

"No." Chaim said.

We all gasped. I kept my head down, avoiding everyone's horrified eyes. No one talked to a teacher like that, especially Mr. Furey, who reached over and tried to snatch off the offending skullcap. Chaim ducked out of reach.

A shock of Mr. Furey's shiny black hair fell over one eye. "Out!" he roared. "Get out of this classroom! And don't come back without your father!"

The next day, Chaim's father, the rabbi, came to school and spoke to Mr. Furey, who reluctantly allowed Chaim to wear his skullcap in class. He wore a baseball cap on top of it outside of school, but the skullcap stuck out the bottom and all the gentile boys made fun of him. He never paid any attention, just kept on walking, eyes staring straight ahead. None of the Jewish kids came to his defence. We walked ahead of him or behind him or across the street, as if he were a lightning rod that would attract trouble onto his narrow shoulders and away from us.

Chaim was the only boy Mr. Furey picked on. He preferred to single out a girl and watch her until he caught her doing something she shouldn't. Then he'd pounce. "Writing in our textbook, are we?" His eyes would bulge out of his head and his long pointed nose would flush with indignation. "How dare you damage school property! Don't you know there's a war on?"

Mr. Furey was one of the few men his age not in uniform, which may have accounted for his obsession with the war. He would pace up and down the aisles, his tall skinny frame bent over, making sure we all wrote on both sides of every piece of paper and used our pencils right down to the nub, and he conducted weekly bottle and newspaper drives for the war effort. What we hated most were the constant bombing and fire drills he held during school hours, especially in winter.

In the weeks before Christmas, Chaim refused to sing Christmas carols. Mr. Furey insisted at first, but Chaim was finally excused from carol singing after his father came to school again and complained. After that, Mr. Furey made Chaim sit outside in the hall doing extra math during the singing. When Chaim came back into class, Mr. Furey wrote extra, more difficult math problems on the blackboard, which Chaim solved with embarrassing ease.

The rabbi's dispensation from carol singing apparently applied only to Chaim, because Mr. Furey made it clear that he expected the rest of the Jewish kids in the class to sing. They all made a great show of mouthing the words, but I was the only one who actually sang them out loud.

Chaim told me, "If you sing, God will strike you dead."

I didn't believe this for a minute, but I thought I'd better check it out with my father.

"An old wives' tale," he snorted. "This is not the way to improve relations between Christians and Jews. Terrible things are happening to the Jews in Europe that are never reported in the newspapers. We must make sure that kind of thing never happens here in Canada. Do you understand?" I wasn't sure, but I nodded. "Anyway, what harm can come from singing a few songs? Even I can appreciate a pretty tune."

Actually, my father couldn't tell an oratorio from a beer commercial, but if there was any chance that I could actually help prevent antisemitism here in Canada, I thought I'd better sing the carols. To tell the truth, I was far more comfortable singing with the gentile majority than sitting silent with the other six Jewish kids in the class who wouldn't.

My father, a self-confessed iconoclast and "a small-L liberal," believed that science superseded "that religious mumbo-jumbo." On the Jewish holy days, when all the other Jewish kids stayed home, my father laid down the law. "You children cannot play in the street with your friends. You may go to synagogue, if you wish. However, in my opinion, you'd be much better off going to school."

The other Jewish kids resented my going to school on the Jewish holidays and the teachers couldn't understand why I attended and they didn't.

But Mr. Furey was delighted. He refused to review old work when the Jewish kids were absent like the other teachers did, but went ahead with new lessons. When the other Jewish kids returned to school, he'd nod in my direction and say, "You can ask your friend here for the work you missed. She came to school even though it was her holiday too."

"You're ashamed of being Jewish," the other Jewish kids accused me after school.

"I am not. My father says it will help improve relations between Christians and Jews. He says that's the important thing."

My father kept reassuring me, "It's not important what other people think. You must do what you think is right."

After Christmas, my father decided that the Jewish Sunday school, which I had attended for the past two years, was inadequate. He enrolled me in the Jewish day school that was held in a room in the basement of the King Edward Street synagogue every weekday after school except Friday, and every Sunday morning. How I hated it! The pupils ranged in age from five to 13, but because I could neither read nor write Hebrew, I had to sit with the five-year-olds in the first row. David Reich and Herby Levin, who were in my class in public school, teased me unmercifully, and even Harold Lipshitz, who was two years younger, snickered when I had to stand and recite the alphabet aloud with the babies.

But the worst part of every day was the six-block walk along York Street to the Jewish day school. The gentile boys followed all the Jewish kids, pushing the girls off the sidewalk and snatching the boys' skullcaps and yelling, "The Jews are so dumb they have to go to two schools a day!"

They kept it up all the way to the basement door of the synagogue, until Reverend Krantzberg ran out on his short legs, coattails flapping, waving one arm in violent circles as though he were shooing away birds, one plump hand on his skullcap to keep it from flying off his head.

In the weeks before Easter, Chaim objected to the Bible passages that Mr. Furey read from the New Testament every morning, especially the ones that accused the Jews of killing Christ. The discussions made me feel uncomfortable because I thought they emphasized the differences between the few Jewish kids and the gentile majority in the class. Chaim would never actually quote from the New Testament but he knew his Bible and it was hard not to be proud of him when he stood up to Mr. Furey, who always started off with the same quotation:

"'And there arose certain, and bare false witness against him.' Mark 14:57."

Chaim argued, "But none of their witnesses agreed with each other."

Mr. Furey's face reddened and he said, loudly, "'Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, "What need we any further witnesses? Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye?" And they all condemned him to be guilty of death.'" Mark 14:63 and 64."

Chaim said, "But in those days Jews were not allowed by law to put a man to death."

Mr. Furey said louder, "But Pilate answered them, saying, 'Will ye that I release unto you the King of the Jews?' For he knew that the chief priests had delivered him for envy. Mark 15:9 and 10."

Chaim said, "The high priest knew that the Romans demanded a Jew as a scapegoat because of their fear of the Messiah."

Mr. Furey yelled, "'When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, 'I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it.' Then answered all the people, and said, 'His blood be on us, and on our children.' Matthew 27:24 and 25."

Chaim said, "This was just..."

Mr. Furey slammed the Bible shut and roared, "Get out your math texts at once! We can't waste valuable class time on nonsense when we have important work to do!"

One early spring day after school, I started out for Jewish school as usual. I was carrying my books and my jacket because it was so warm. I was late because I'd been working on a geography project and the other Jewish kids were far ahead of me. One of the big gentile boys from Grade 7 came lurching down the street behind me, pretending to be drunk. He banged into me, knocking me into the gutter, where my books fell open and my stencils and maps scattered into the street. Another boy kicked my books until the pages flew into the air and fluttered down like crumpled leaves.

"Oh, so sorry, Jew. Did I step on your stencil?" He ground it under his heel.

The boys picked up handfuls of gravel from a driveway nearby and began to throw them at me. The sharp stones burned like bee stings on my bare arms and legs. I started to cry. A fat woman passing by, carrying two shopping bags, stopped to stare. The boys ran off, leaving me kneeling and sobbing in the gutter while I tried to gather up my books and papers.

When I got home that night, I told my father what had happened. He was outraged and insisted that I tell Mr. Furey at school the next day. "Those boys were students from your school. He'll soon sort them out."

When I arrived in class the next morning I went straight to the front of the room and stood before Mr. Furey's desk. He looked up and glared at me. "Well?" he asked impatiently. "What seems to be the problem?"

I described what had happened the day before. When I showed him the cuts on my arms and legs and my torn notebooks, his face turned very red and I remember thinking with satisfaction that those boys were really going to get it now.

"What do you mean by coming to me with this ridiculous story?" he demanded in a loud voice. Everyone in the class stopped talking and stared at me. "I despise tattletales!"

I was too stunned to speak. A fiery heat suffused my chest and throat and burned two hot spots into my cheeks. "What do you expect me to do about it? This didn't occur on school premises. Go back to your seat at once and don't let me hear any more of this nonsense!"

I slunk back to my seat and tried to ignore the whispers of the others. But Chaim caught my eye and shrugged in a gesture I recognized as one of acceptance and solidarity, as if to say, "See, you're a member of the tribe after all."

Daughters Should Never

Sylvia Solomon

Daughters should always
Go back:
To hometowns filled with memories of light.
They should play where mothers played,
Stroll along well-travelled paths,
Pass old friends in greeting.

Daughters should always
Go back:
And imagine their mothers in days of ease and play,
When life was simply surrounded
By love, and safety,
And joy.

Daughters should never have to Go back:
To see their mother's horror and pain,
To places where no children lived
For all were older than time,
Where safety and joy were overcome
With things too dark to know.

And in this place
To which Daughters should never have to Go back:
Perhaps they'll make a story whole,
Perhaps they'll see
What daughters
Should never have to see –
Except in a world like ours
Where daughters
Have to Go back.

Bumper stickers in the Holy Land:
Ayn Od M'Levado: there is none else.

The golden light of the golden hills of Jerusalem spills over layers of sand-coloured buildings undulating like lazy Mediterranean waves. In the distance, a golden dome caresses ancient stained glass windows in ancient synagogues.
On the new Rapid Transit which runs the seam between East and West Jerusalem
Chassidic men with payes, sassy girls in mini-skirts, men quietly fingering rosaries, Greek Orthodox priests in flowing black robes, smokey-eyed women wearing niqabs, and camera-slung tourists.
The announcements are in Hebrew and Arabic.

At Damascus Gate we smile at the shouts of asara, asara which we once mistook for a call to prayer, rather than the price, ten shekels, for the bounty of fruit, herbs, vegetables, clothing, shoes, electronic devices;
we meander past stalls spilling aromatic herbs,
Turkish delight, halvah, dates, figs, olives, carpets, tapestries and ceramics onto the incessant crowds.
We move towards the Western Wall.

Bumper stickers in the Holy Land
Ayn Od M'Levado: there is none else.

The bumper stickers disappear in a cloud of belching exhaust fumes and pushing, shouting crowds.
I want only dates and honey plucked from bee's lips; I want the sun to be serene, and to cast no shadows.
I want the Wall to welcome men and women,
Arabs and Jews with equal Abrahamic hospitality. I want the streets to be free of plastic bags and litter, the overflowing garbage bins not to house an infinite number of feral cats. I want to be welcomed as I greet men and women of all faiths. I want my wide-eyed hope not to be scorned.
I want to dance fearlessly at the Gaza border knowing that my dancing will dissolve boundaries of hatred; I want the centuries of intolerable conflict to dissolve in the love of the One God.

And it seems that all I get to do, as I walk the streets of my beloved Jerusalem is pray: help me accept
Ayn Od M'Levado: there is none else.

I just can't wait to see him
And hear him call my name
It's been a whole week since he's been away
I remember every summer
At the cottage by the woods
Every Sabbath was my special time with daddy
I remember sitting with my daddy by the river stream
He would tell me all his stories
And I'd begin to dream
Tell me all your stories daddy
Of so long ago
How did you get that hole upon your arm?
Tell me daddy tell me please
Because I want to know
How is it that you came to such great harm
He looked at me tears in his eyes

As he began to sing
He sang about a violin that couldn't play a string

His younger brother blessed with talent
Way beyond his years
Was dragged of to a prison camp
Filled with people's tears

He said that those were darkened times
When stars had left the sky
He hid deep in the forest
In trees so way up high
His heart was filled with terror
And agonizing pain
He didn't know if he'd survive
Or ever sing again
Years later you were born, my child
Again the stars shone bright
And I would sing you lullabies
Each and every night

Who oh daddy why I asked did they do that to you?

The Nazis did it Myrala because I am a Jew

The fleeting of time

Rose Romberg

As I leafed through my weekly edition of The CJN, I noticed, to my chagrin, a heading that gave me quite a jolt:

The Passover literary supplement for authors and poets.

Once again, I was struck by the essence of the fleeting time. In mind and heart's eye, I found it difficult to fully grasp that we are almost on the threshold of Pesach. It seemed to me as if it was only yesterday that my granddaughter and I, in festive mood, had walked along the long hallway to open the door for Elijah to enter.

Walking back hand in hand to join family and guests at the table for the blessings of the fourth koyse of wine with our illusive guest of honour, I was overcome by the emotional force of sobriety.

What if... what if I would be conspicuous by my permanent absence next year. After all, I had reached the hoary age of 94. Who can ask for anything more? It was a time to say "Dayeinu."

"Mother," my daughter broke my reverie. "Are you feeling OK?" she asked with concern in her voice.

"I'm fine dear. Why do you ask?"

"You're so quiet suddenly," she guardedly observed.

"I guess I am a bit tired."

The past two days I had cooked the gefilte fish, made a large jar of pickled beets (that they are so fond of), baked two huge sponge cakes and one honey cake, prepared the seder platter, and if all that weren't enough, baked several dozen of everybody's favourite mandelbroit.

Since my unfortunate accident, I have become a semi-invalid and have gotten into the habit of retiring by seven o'clock, usually with tea in bed.

Needless to say, I didn't mention any of this. However, I thought this was an opportune time to mention once again, and with feigned courage I said, "Honey, this time I will leave this singular treasured seder platter for you to keep as an heirloom. It is one of my special possessions. It was given to me by a charming English gentleman, but that's another story and I don't want to hear your usual rebuttal." My children refuse to face reality – the inevitable.

And so, our happy and meaningful first seder has come to an end, and my adult grandchildren are scurrying around in search of the afikoman. Dayeinu!

To be continued, God willing, next year...

Well, it appears that the Good Lord has seen fit to have me present at yet another seder. I suspect He is testing my faith. I truly believe I am living the Book of Job. And so, like a flash of light, we are once again almost on the threshold of Passover.

This past year has not been kind to me. It has been a year of six changes in residence, with much enervation. My mind is in constant conflict with my body, but what the hell... It means I can look back and reflect on a past rich in myriad of happenings... From the depth of despair to moments of joy, almost reaching a star... Dayeinu. The so-called Golden Years have become extremely tarnished. Nevertheless, I count my blessings. For I have reached the Golden Age of 95. Sakes alive!

Now once again, I shall have the privilege to prepare the contents on the seder plate. A jar of pickled beets and, of course, Unger's gefilte fish. But the cakes and mandelbroit will have to be ordered.

God willing, I will sit at my cherished daughter's table, opposite my favourite son-in-law, who, in his booming voice, will conduct the seder, from the 11 Dayeinus to the fourth koyse of wine. Escorted by my grandchildren, I shall once again, if the Good Lord wills it, open the door and, from beyond, Elijah's spirit will enter our home and taste with us again the wine of endless promise. Dayeinu!

In God's shoes

David Reich

This Erev Yom Kippur, the evening beginning the Day of Atonement, would be different for Rabbi Yosef and his wife, the rebbetzin. They usually started the fast after a ceremonial meal together – only the two of them. In privacy they could discuss the year that had passed, transgressions they had committed and inadvertent slights, errors and omissions that might have been hurtful or blasphemous. Then they would walk to the synagogue prepared to beg forgiveness from the Almighty and express heartfelt contrition.

This year they would not be alone. They would share their meal with a guest.

Shmuel Rastopovitch had asked to be invited. His request was unprecedented. He met the rabbi frequently to discuss community needs and special problems of their co-religionists. But never socially. Shmuel was not a social person, not given to small talk. He attended cocktail parties and banquets only where his absence would be an insult and he left early. In keeping with his usual manner, he had apologized profusely for his intrusion on his rabbi's privacy on the most solemn day on the Hebrew calendar, but it was a matter of urgency.

Shmuel was not simply another member of the rabbi's congregation. His wealth, piety and generosity were legendary, but it was his retiring modesty that was regarded with baffled awe by his fellow congregants. He occupied a seat in the last row of the synagogue and attended services faithfully, but politely turned down numerous invitations to read from the holy scrolls. His home was small and unpretentious, he'd never married and had no known family. There was no reserved parking space for his modest car in the large lot behind his factory, and his clothing was indistinguishable from that of his workers. And he had many workers. His large and prosperous clothing company supplied men and women's apparel to the country's largest department stores. His income, although unannounced, must have been vast. His contributions to his community were munificent and, where possible, anonymous. His private office, adorned only by a faded photograph of his father and mother, was only closed when he found time to study some sacred text.

Although he was largely responsible for building the synagogue, he declined the honour of turning the first sod or of laying its cornerstone. His name didn't appear on the honour roll displayed in its marble-clad lobby. But when his gifts couldn't be concealed, he neither sought nor accepted scrolls, plaques or other traditional tributes. Quiet and unassuming, he never aspired to any office. No buildings carried his name, he sat on no board of directors, made no speeches and declined any interviews. He hardly existed, except to his fellow workers and to a discreet agent who distributed his many benefactions. He was content to be Shmuel, nothing more.

His private endowments were never publicized, but word-of-mouth affirmed that no deserving family departed from his door in need. His shrewd appraisal could unmask fraudulent requests, but if he erred, it was on the side of generosity. His employees heaped praise on his fairness. Any in difficulty could come to him and be sure of his heartfelt assistance. His reputation, despite his reticence, grew with time and assumed mythical proportions. He never asked anything for himself. Therefore his unexpected request to share the rabbi's meal before the start of the Holy Day was welcomed. It was a signal honour.

A light knock announced his arrival. Shmuel was a slight man, with no distinguishing features. His pinched watery blue eyes peered through deep wrinkles earned over many years; no one knew how many. Those not aware of his reputation might overlook his presence. His voice was low, and although he wasted few words, they were attentively heeded.

"Thank you and your rebbetzin for receiving me on this sacred evening," he murmured. "I wouldn't have asked had it not been of the greatest importance."

In God's shoes

"You're welcome any time, Shmuel."

The meal was served with appropriate ceremony. Conversation was about community concerns and future needs for institutions and individuals that Shmuel supported. After tea, the rabbi leaned back and waited.

Shmuel came to the point immediately.

"Rabbi, I'm greatly troubled. First, let me say that I have a cancer. My doctors have warned me that it cannot be treated and the end will be soon."

The rabbi was shocked. "Surely something can be done. There are other specialists, experimental treatments..."

"I assure you nothing can be done. I'm many years past three score and 10 and my time has come. This is not my greatest concern. It's the hereafter that troubles me."

"Surely not. Your life has been an inspiration for all of us. Our community and many of its individuals have benefited from your generosity. Your place in paradise is as assured as any man's can be."

"Not so. My life has been a fraud, a pretense. What you cannot know is that I once killed a blameless man. Yes, I'm as guilty as if I'd fired a bullet into his brain."

"Surely, there were extenuating circumstance. You aren't a murderer."

"Listen, rabbi. There were no extenuating circumstances; it was for my benefit, mine alone. You know I passed three years in the death camps of the late war. The deprivation, the suffering, the humiliation were indescribable. Death could only be delayed by instant obedience to our overseers. Those unable to obey were either gassed or they perished from disease, hunger or from the inability to labour for the Third Reich. Emaciated corpses were stacked every day to be incinerated. I found my own father there as I was marched to the quarry where we laboured. I couldn't even pray over his body. The strongest survived longest, a fortunate few lived to be liberated. I was one of them.

"We were fed only enough to keep us alive while we crushed stones with hammers 10 hours every day. We were constantly on our feet. Those who faltered or fell were shot. The ground was covered with sharp stones. Without shoes, our feet would be shredded; footwear was a constant concern. As my soles wore down, I used rags, wood slats – whatever I could find. You must understand that materials were not at hand. Sometimes bribery helped, or theft. Even murder. Shoes meant life or death.

"One evening, in search of an acquaintance, I entered a barrack. It was empty except for several wretches lying on their wooden shelves. I recognized one: an old man I had seen several times, hammering rocks. Apparently he was a new arrival, unused to our conditions. He lay exhausted, his eyes closed, his head supported on a pair of almost-new shoes placed carefully under his head for safekeeping. They would fit my feet. I couldn't take my eyes off those shoes. With those shoes, my miserable existence might be prolonged. I could think of nothing but those shoes. That old man's skull rested on my life. I hesitated only a moment, then carefully eased his shoes from under his unconscious head. He didn't move. As soon as his shoes were in my hands, I ran from the barrack. Those shoes saved my life.

"I never saw that old man again. Death must have taken him the next day by any of the shortcuts to the hereafter provided by our oppressors. But by saving myself I killed him.

"I came to this country with nothing. I worked hard. God rewarded me at every turn with financial success. But every day I saw that old man's face and knew I lived in his shoes. I gave my riches away as fast as I earned them. I couldn't offend the Almighty by taking credit for my alleged generosity. As I said, I was a fraud, a pretender – deserving nothing.

"Now I am dying. I have no regrets, except that I killed an innocent man. How will I face God? Atonement isn't possible for this crime. I can't confess it to the community. They look to me as an example. Rabbi, advise me."

The rabbi's face lit up.

"Shmuel, God has sent you to me. You may know that at the start of the war my father had placed me with a gentile family before he was transported to the same camp as you. He died there. My father was a doctor. One of his grateful patients, a fellow prisoner who had been deported with him, gave me the particulars of his fate. My father was not strong. The few days in the camp exhausted him beyond measure. One night, a week after his arrival, he lay down on his platform, removed his shoes from his swollen feet and put them under his head for safekeeping. Next morning he was dead. He had died in his sleep. His shoes were gone. No one knew how. Now you've completed his story. You stole shoes, but from a dead man."

"But I intended to steal. I gave no thought to the old man's life."

"If we're to be punished for our intentions we'll all pass eternity in hell," the rabbi said. "Atone, and know that you killed no one."

Shmuel blessed the rabbi and departed with a restored spirit. He could face death fearlessly.

The rebbetzin had listened in silence. Now she turned to the rabbi. "Yosef, you told me that your father had successfully been hidden by a sympathetic family until the war ended. He then redeemed you and brought you to this country. He died at home, in his own bed."

"Yes, that was the truth."

"Then you lied to Shmuel."

"I did more than lie. I sinned. I judged another human and cleansed him of a mortal sin. How can I atone for that?"

"But your intentions were honourable. You relieved a good man of his anxieties. No one was harmed."

"True, but, as I said, intentions are not rewarded or punished. Shmuel only put on another man's shoes. I put on God's shoes. The Almighty is strict. He punishes transgressors. He'll judge both of us."

"Yosef, I must be frank with you, although I betray a confidence. Your father swore me to secrecy – he didn't want you to know the horrors he had survived. He hadn't been hidden, as he'd told you. He'd been a prisoner in that camp, he'd been worked almost to death and he'd slept with his precious shoes under his head. Yes, they'd been stolen during the night but he survived their loss. It was his good fortune that the very next morning prisoners who were doctors were taken to work in the camp hospital. He told no one of this. He didn't want it known he'd worked for his oppressors. Shmuel killed no one. You forgave him for a sin he didn't commit. You have nothing to repent."

"My dear rebbetzin, Father never told you any such story. It's an invention. You lie now, to protect me."

"Have I lied to you before? And now you don't know, you can't be sure."

"But God knows."

"Then God will judge me. The Almighty is a loving God. He forgives transgressors. He reads our souls and considers intentions as well as deeds. Let Him do His work. That's why we praise Him, blessed be His Name."

The Liquid Garden In The Holy Land

Barbie Dukes

A place of divinity.
Of healing.
Of natural source and essence.

A place which makes me feel whole.

Bright, nourishing sun. Balmy breeze.
Surrounded by exquisite natural gardens.
Flowers perfume the warm, gentle wind.
Birds sing in the distance. Deciduous leaves quietly caress the air's breath, filling it with joyful, loving energy.

The spirit of possibility and encouragement exude out of every living and breathing element.

All the forces of nature,
Healing Loving Gentle Encouraging
Breathing Life and Hope. "You can do it. We are here to support and guide you."

I hear the wisdom of the warm sun the loving song of the rustling leaves.

I feel the comfort of the soft sand the support of the tender grass

A vast body of water spreads before me, offering the openness and wonder of possibility.
The natural sources of this body of water springs from a divine essence.

Warm and inviting.

Refreshing and exhilarating.

I jump in.

The Beautiful Burden

Brandon Marlon

How can any individual, any people, be worthy of implementing and executing the divine plan?
I despair at the heady thought of attempting to fulfill the charge of actualizing scripture.
Who is man, even high priest, even saint,
to assume the mantle of heavenly emissary?
Shall we not shudder at the prospect of the load, of carrying out the sublime and eternal will?
We have not the resources, nor the mortal hours, to realize the supernal dreams of the Most High,
yet we are bequeathed words of water and flame, that we might employ modest means to exalt
Him:
A people apart, willingly laden with onerous Torah, must gratefully succumb to the beautiful burden.

Zaidy's Visa

Chana Rochel Sugihara

My grandfather, HaRav Avraham Mordechai ben HaRav Avraham Mordechai, said:

I have only been jealous of one thing in my lifetime – to have a memory of a living father.

My grandfather, born in Kodne, Poland, 1916
Was the sole survivor of his family of hundreds.

His passport to freedom was issued by Chiune Sugihara, a God-sent diplomat serving as Japanese consul in Lithuania.

Zaidy escaped through Shanghai at age 23 with a group of Yeshiva boys who merited life.

Mr. Sugihara granted salvation to more than six thousand Jews;
an eternal hero, he lives on through untold generations

I keep a copy of Zaidy's visa together with mine.
I, Chana Rochel, named for Zaidy's grandmother – also have my passport because of Chiune Sugihara.

We would like to take this opportunity to wish all of our patients, family and friends a healthy and happy Passover. And may we see peace in Israel and around the world.

The Gold Ring

Rachel Piuti

We had a party going in our house. A warm summer breeze blew gently through the open windows making the soft, sheer curtains swing lightly as if in a dance. On the window sill stood the borrowed gramophone with the horn-shaped tube from which flowed the velvety voices of such popular singers as Hanka Ordonovna and Jan Kiepura. Young people, and many not so young – uncles and aunts – their faces lit up by smiles, were milling around with glasses of wine held high, shouting, "L'chaim! To life!"

It was the July 11, 1939, and we had a double celebration: my sister Sara had turned 16 that day, and she had matriculated from high school that June. Our parents were extremely happy and relieved, because for almost a year there was a question of whether the Ministry of Education would allow her to matriculate before 16, since the required age was 18. However, her marks were very high, and, the school system was in the process of changing: a number of students were younger than 18, so, when our school principal intervened with the authorities on her behalf, the ministry decided in her favour.

My sister was so much younger than her fellow students because she was very unhappy when our brother, Shiyek, started school. He was 16 months older than Sara and they had been constant companions. When Shiyek went to school the first day, Sara cried all morning until he came back at noon. The next day was a repetition of the first. Apparently nothing could console her nor divert her, not even my appearance – the newly born baby.

A few days later, our Mother went to the school with Sara and asked the principal to allow Sara to sit in the classroom with Shiyek. She explained the situation, how close they were; she assured him that Sara was bright and wouldn't disrupt the class.

The principal, Dr. Hurwicz, was a good and understanding man, and he agreed to let Sara sit in Grade 1 at the age of four. When the school year ended and Sara knew everything that the other children had learned, and to read and to write, the teacher asked Dr. Hurwicz what to do about Sara, her brightest student.

He said: "We will let her go to Grade 2 next year. One year, when she will find it too hard, we will keep her back."

Sara had never been held back. There was never any reason to keep her back. She was always the top student in her class. Here she was now, 12 years later, happy and excited, and we, her family, were very proud of her.

The party was lively. Drinks flowed. Toasts were drunk to Sara. To our parents, to uncles and aunts, to teachers and to friends. A table laden with fish, meats, vegetables and fruit tempted everyone with its colours and aromas. Nobody was shy. Everybody ate their fill.

Toward the end of the evening, my parents presented Sara with a gift: a gold ring with her initials engraved on it. It looked very elegant on her finger and she was thrilled with it. From relatives and friends she received scarves, perfumes, books and many other lovely gifts too numerous to mention. But the ring she really cherished.

I remember that summer of 1939 as a very happy time. Many of Sara's and Shiyek's friends came to our home. We had a garden with room to play volleyball and other games, unlike friends who lived in apartment buildings in the centre of the city. There was constantly something going on in our home. We put on plays that many of the neighbourhood children came to see.

One afternoon in late August, Sara, Shiyek and a few of their friends played volleyball. They played a long time and came into the house perspiring and hungry. They went to wash up a bit while mother prepared a light supper. Suddenly I heard Sara scream: "My ring! I lost the ring!"

Nobody thought about supper anymore. It was still bright outside, and we all spilled out to look for the ring. It must have slipped off her finger while she was playing ball. The poles with the net stood on the grass. We began combing the area, looking, moving the grass with our hands until it got too dark to see. We would look again tomorrow, we decided. Supper didn't taste very good, in spite of the fresh rolls and colourful salad, nor was the conversation as lively as usual.

I heard Sara toss and turn during the night until I fell asleep, and didn't hear anything more. By the time I got up in the morning, Sara was already combing through the grass. The search went on for many days and then, occasionally, for many weeks.

The war broke out in September. We continued living in our house until the spring of 1941, when we had to move to the ghetto. Father was now a worker in our tannery and he went there every morning. The German director of the tannery moved into our house. One day, the Polish man who tended to the garden for the German director approached my father furtively.

"I have something that I believe belongs to you. I was digging in the garden around the walnut tree and I noticed something shining. I bent down to pick it up and saw that it was a ring."

He handed my father a small object wrapped in a piece of brown paper. Father looked at it and was overwhelmed. It was Sara's ring. He couldn't believe it. The ring had been found after two years. It was lying there all this time and nobody had seen it. But he was moved even more by the honesty of the man. He could have taken the ring and nobody would have known.

When father returned home that evening and gave Sara the ring, she started crying. She could never forget that she lost the ring. It was for her a symbol. It was given to her in recognition of her abilities and achievements. And now it was restored to her. It was restored together with a belief that there were still good and honest people in the world, and that maybe one day, the world would come back to its senses.

Winter

Rachel Piuti

It was Monday morning in early December, 1939. I slid slowly from under the warm cover. The soft fur of the shaggy mat beside my bed caressed my bare feet. It felt good. I stepped into my wool-lined slippers, wrapped the still-warm comforter around my shoulders and went to the window. A blanket of snow covered the ground as far as my eyes could see. The tree branches, bereft of leaves but heavy with fresh snow, had a silvery-mauve hue in the early morning sun. Big snowflakes kept falling quietly.

I heard voices coming from the kitchen. Breakfast was being prepared. Time to get up. Get up to what? There was no rush, there was no school. Not since the war began. I could do the homework that Sara assigned me but I didn't really feel like it. Being instructed by my sister was not the same as going to school. It was boring. I sometimes couldn't stop yawning. Yet I had to do it. Mother insisted that I study and be ready to resume normal schooling when the war ended.

I got dressed and joined the family in the dining room. We were seven now instead of five. Uncle Avram, my father's oldest brother, and Aunt Feiga were staying with us. They had to vacate their apartment on Zeromskiego street. It was the main street and Jews had been forbidden to live there since the Occupation. We ate our breakfast. We still had plenty of food. There was fresh bread, butter, cheese and jam.

"No herring?" my brother Shiyek asked.

"We should be grateful for what we have." Mother said." Many people are worse off."

A welcome warmth flowed from the fireplace. It took time for the coals to turn red and give off heat. We were lucky we still had coal. Some people didn't have any. We could take some from the pile of coal that fed the two furnaces that produced steam for our tannery machines.

"Could you maybe go today to Mr. Krakowski?" Dad asked Mom. "He owes me 200 zloty. Could you spare the time? Rachel could go with you. You would be safer together. You could hold on to each other not to slip on the ice."

"Yes. I have lots of time, and so does Rachel," Mother said

We got ready to go. We each put on a woolen sweater, scarf, hat, gloves, coat and boots. We had to go because it was dangerous for father to do it. Since the Nazi occupation, raids occurred almost every day and men were taken away or beaten up.

I held on to my mother. It was slippery under the falling snow. The wind got stronger as we walked. The skirt of my coat blew open. My bare thighs felt numb below the short dress. I had a sensation of being pricked by pins. My eyes began to water. I didn't say anything. Mother probably suffered as much. How far did we still have to go? I wondered. But I didn't want to ask. I hoped not too far.

We arrived in less than an hour at Mr. Krakowski's tannery. The doorman escorted us to the office. Mr. Krakowski welcomed us with a bright smile, kissed Mom's hand and shook mine. He was a tall man with graying hair. Perhaps my father's age? He looked at us with friendly blue eyes.

"You are freezing," he said, while rubbing his hands. "Yan," he called to the doorman, "bring two glasses of strong, hot tea. No, bring three. I'll have some too." He cleared papers off a couple of chairs, and asked us to sit.

"How is Mr. Najdik?" He looked at us, searched for an answer in our faces. "He didn't dare to come? Times are bad. Who would have thought it would come to this?" he asked, shaking his head.

We sat beside the massive brown desk and sipped sweet, hot tea. It felt good. A red-hot iron stove with a long tin pipe hissed and gave off a delightful warmth. My cheeks began to burn.

"How is your family?" Mom asked Mr. Krakowski.

"My son was in the army. He was taken prisoner but is back home now. He works with me in the tannery but his heart isn't in it. He is restless. Hates the Germans. My wife is worried about him. But I know that you have it much harder. We are aware of what is going on. Mrs. Najdik, I know that you came for the money I owe your husband, and that you are anxious to go back home."

He opened a drawer of the desk and counted out two hundred zloty.

"I wish you good luck. Let us hope for better times," he said as he gave the money to my mother.

I looked up at the wall above the desk and noticed a space a shade paler than the rest of the wall. I recognized the shape: it was the outline of the White Eagle, the Polish national emblem. The White Eagle must have been hanging there for many years and had to be taken down because of the Occupation. Who would have thought?

Mom got another kiss on her hand and I got a strong handshake. We began our trek home. The wind was still blowing and howling as we passed open fields. The sun was now higher in the sky, but it was a pale and cold sun that shone on us.

An unexpected encounter

Judy Weinryb

The small package sat on the broken sidewalk in front of the Haimishe Bakery in the Boro Park section of Brooklyn. Wrapped in plain brown paper, with several strands of string holding it together, it was drenched from the rain that was pouring down on this dreary Friday morning.

Sara Mendlovitz found it when she arrived at seven o'clock. She noticed that it was addressed to Chaim, her husband and business partner. At first glance, she hesitated to touch it, but as it did not look particularly suspicious, she scooped it up and took it inside. After leaving it on a shelf in the pantry, she got to work, setting out trays of pastries and challahs that had been baked before her arrival. Chaim was attending a bris for a neighbour's new grandson and did not arrive until eight. In good spirits after a hearty breakfast, he rolled up his sleeves and began working alongside Sara on what was traditionally their busiest day of the week.

Chaim's family had been bakers in Hungary for generations. His father, Meir Mendlovitz, had been the sole survivor of his family after the Holocaust. Fate had spared him as he had been sent to live with relatives in England in 1933. He moved to the United States in 1960 with his wife and children, the eldest of whom was Chaim, and settled in Brooklyn. He decided to follow in his family's footsteps and opened the bakery soon after he arrived. Chaim and Sara were introduced by a matchmaker and married in 1985. After Chaim's father died, they took over the running of the bakery and worked hard to keep it going.

In November, sundown came early. Deadlines needed to be met, and deliveries would have to be made promptly before closing up shop at 2 p.m.

"Bronstein bar mitzvah's this Shabbas. I need six-dozen chocolate rugelach and a large box of mixed fruit danishes." Sara paused for a moment and reflected on the occasion.

"Little Shlomo Bronstein, can you believe it, bar mitzvahed already? The way he reads from the Torah, he reminds me of his grandfather, Reb Moshe Bronstein, of blessed memory. I heard him practising yesterday at his grandmother's apartment. What a pleasure." As she spoke, she placed unbaked cinnamon rolls evenly on trays.

"Isn't it amazing," she continued "that two members of the same family can have so much in common, even though they've never actually met?"

This comment resonated deeply with Chaim. He often wondered whether he would have had anything in common with his relatives who had been murdered by the Nazis before he was born. Sometimes he imagined what it would be like to attend family gatherings with them, their children and even their grandchildren. He was immersed in his thoughts when the sound of Sara's voice drew him back to the present.

"Chaim!" she exclaimed excitedly, "I forgot to tell you. I found a package for you outside the store this morning. I meant to give it you when you arrived, but I was so busy it slipped my mind."

"A package for me? Seems odd that someone would leave it outside"

Peeling off the layers of soggy paper, he uncovered a silver kiddush cup, intricately designed with delicate-looking flowers and vines winding around the perimeter. It was tarnished and looked as if it had seen better days.

"This poor little cup, it needs to be polished so badly," Sara remarked. "I wonder how it got into this state?"

Chaim found a note taped to the box. It read, "This cup belonged to your grandparents, Solomon and Sonia Mendlovitz. I am sending it to you as I know you will care for it as is befitting a family heirloom." It was signed "Sonia Mendlovitz."

Chaim was dumbfounded. As far as he knew, his father had been the only surviving member of his family after the war. He had been told that his father's oldest sister, Sonia, had died at Auschwitz. Could this be a strange quirk of fate, a miracle of sorts? Or was it merely a scam, a cruel attempt to obtain money under fraudulent circumstances? How had the sender of this package located him, and if his aunt were alive, how much time could she possibly have left? By all accounts she would be at least 95.

Chaim tried to put the mystery out of his mind as he still had much work to do. Later on, as he was cleaning the counters in preparation for closing, he heard the front door open and saw a tall, blond woman in a grey business suit walk into the store. She appeared to be not much older than 40. She was carrying a briefcase, so he assumed she intended to sell him baking supplies, insurance or even a new furnace. He would be clear with her that he was not interested in buying anything, especially on a Friday afternoon.

"Mr. Mendlovitz, may I have a few minutes of your time?"

As her eyes locked with his, the woman's voice quivered, as though she was begging rather than simply asking him to speak to her. She began to move closer when her left ankle gave way and she stumbled, then grabbed on to the counter to steady herself.

"Sit down, madam, please. A glass of water for the lady, Sara!" he called to the back room where his wife was busy doing her calculations of the day's sales.

"I'm sorry," the woman said quietly as she sat down on a chair nearby.

Her business-like facade had melted away. Chaim thought there was something oddly familiar about her, but he could not figure out what it was. Perhaps it was her eyes, something about the way she looked at him. She took a deep breath and began to speak.

"My name is Sonia Frasier. I live in the Bronx and I am your cousin. I was named after my grandmother, Sonia Mendlovitz, who died in Auschwitz and until a month ago, I had no idea that I was Jewish. Chaim stepped back and stared at her as if she was a ghost.

"I've startled you. Please, let me explain. You see, my father died barely a month ago. Before he died, he told me the truth about my mother's past. She had, unfortunately, died 10 years earlier. Maybe this will help you understand what I want to tell you."

Sonia opened the briefcase she was carrying and pulled out a small, tattered-looking book.

"This was my mother's diary. After the funeral, I found it among my father's belongings. It was yellow and faded, but I was still able to make out the words."

She opened the diary and began to read.

May 15, 1963

Yesterday, Suzi told me that I am not her real daughter. What a shock! She said that my mother and father were killed in the war. Suzi worked in their hat shop and knew them well. When the Nazis began rounding up Jews, my parents left me with her. She loved my mother very much and was crying when she spoke about her.

I feel so lost and confused. My life is like a puzzle that has broken into pieces. I need time to reassemble the pieces in a way that makes sense to me.

"Over time she grew to accept what Suzi had told her. She found a job in Budapest and, soon after, met my father. Here is an excerpt written around that time."

June 23, 1965

Carl and I met at a dance two months ago. He is in Hungary as a visiting professor in mathematics and is going back to America in two weeks. Last night he asked me to marry him. Of course, I said yes right away! He is a good man and understands the turmoil I have gone though in my life. We are planning a church wedding in New York, where he lives. I can hardly wait.

"Two years later, she wrote this entry."

Aug. 12, 196-

We have a sweet daughter whom we named Sonia, after my late mother. I have asked Carl not to tell Sonia about her Jewish heritage. I feel it would confuse her, and besides, it is a cruel world and she may be better off not knowing.

"Still she never forgot her parents. She wrote these touching words years later."

Sept. 18, 1993

It was very courageous for my parents to leave me with Suzi, not knowing if they would ever see me again. I cannot even imagine how they must have suffered. I will never know their true fate. Perhaps it is better that way.

Sonia looked up at Chaim with tears in her eyes. "Although she could not remember details of her childhood, my father told me she experienced flashbacks and unbearable nightmares over the years. I believe she longed for her parents, even though she could hardly remember them.

"Her adopted mother gave my mother a letter from her parents that described where some family heirlooms were buried. Because of it, she was able to locate a few pieces of jewelry and religious articles. The silver cup I gave you was among them.

"It was also from her diary that I learned that she had been born Faiga Mendlovitz. I only knew her as Frances, the name she adopted in America. I also learned about my poor grandmother Sonia, after whom I am named. In honour of her memory, I've decided to adopt her family name, and, although I have not yet changed it legally, I signed my letter to you as Sonia Mendlovitz."

Chaim was feeling uneasy. He had to ask Sonia an important question. "How did you find me? That must have been quite difficult."

"It was my father, not me, who did that. He felt sorry for my mother, as she was completely alone in the world, so he began to make enquiries without telling her. He found out about the archives at Yad Vashem. He discovered that your father had moved to the U.S. but had already died. Eventually, he located your bakery. He told me he dropped in here a few times and tried to start a conversation with you. He felt awkward, and even though he really wanted to tell you who he was, he just couldn't. My mother died soon after, so he never came back."

Chaim stood silently, feeling at a loss for words. Sonia seemed like a lost child searching for a home. He felt amazed and bewildered, at the same time. Meeting her was a like a miracle of sorts. He did not quite know what to make of it.

"After I left the package this morning," Sonia added, "I went home. Later on, I thought it over and decided to come back and introduce myself to you. I'm glad I did." She stood up and began to walk toward the door.

At that moment, Sara rushed frantically into the bakery.

"Chaim, I just remembered, I have to pick up my sheitel from Mrs. Berman's for the bar mitzvah tomorrow."

As she turned toward him, she stopped dead in her tracks. He looked different. His face displayed a look of contentment generally reserved for Friday evenings at the Sabbath table, when he was seated with his family around him.

"Sara," Chaim said cheerfully, before she could utter a word. "This is my cousin, Sonia. She came from the Bronx to meet me. Perhaps she will consider joining us for dinner. She brought us the kiddush cup that you found outside this morning. It belonged to my grandparents in Hungary. What a simchah it would be if we could use it together to bless the Sabbath Queen."

When I'm 64

Harold Pupko

It was the '60s.

More specifically, Times Square, Dec. 31, 1966. Midnight approached.

Socrates Berlin did not like waiting.

Unwilling to be controlled by the drop of a ball, Socrates Berlin opted to drop to one knee and ask the love of his life, Bella Rose Gershwin, to spend the rest of her life married to him. The people surrounding the couple responded with overwhelming support for the proposal before Bella had a chance to fully consider the offer. She was swept up by the enthusiasm of the crowd, and her fate was sealed.

A late June wedding was planned.

As the wedding date neared, Socrates proposed to Bella again. Pointing out to his beloved that, after marriage, their journey would be as one, he suggested that they both adopt a new last name to reflect their status as a couple united in life. Socrates and Bella were quite aware of the degree of importance that their families placed upon the sacred process of naming. They were both the only children of Holocaust survivors, and their first names reflected that fact.

For Socrates' parents, the art of asking questions was not just an essential survival skill for navigating a potentially hostile world: it was the core element of their understanding of Judaism. They did their best to teach their son to master this skill. By naming him Socrates, they hoped that he would grow up to emulate his namesake by posing painful questions of a world that masqueraded as a civilization, and that those questions would contribute to moving the planet forward on its slow march to maturity.

And why the name Socrates, rather than a nice Jewish name like Hillel? That was precisely the point. The Berlins wanted Socrates to be able to blend into society without suffering the limitations of antisemitism, so they gave him a name that they thought would protect him from being overly identified as Jewish. They failed to calculate what schoolyard bullies would make of the name.

Because of the Holocaust, Socrates was robbed of any living connection to his family's roots. He only understood the concept of grandparents, uncles, aunts and cousins on a theoretical basis, never having enjoyed the benefit of the real thing.

Socrates learned to love the theoretical.

Bella's parents came from Belarus, a land decimated of Jewish content by the Nazi plague. With so many dead relatives to name their only child after, Bella's parents deliberated at length on an appropriate name for their daughter. Influenced by their love of music, the name Bella Rose emerged as a homophonic symphonic Kaddish in memory of the kedoshim of Belarus.

Bella Rose, who should have grown up peacefully in Belarus, eventually made her way from a displaced persons camp to the freedom of America and the love of Socrates, providing a practical balance to his overactive imagination. Finding that balance was often challenging, and Socrates' project to name their union pushed the couple's creativity to the brink. The names Bershwin and Gerlin were quickly dismissed, and all subsequent proposals failed to light the flame of satisfaction for either party. As time moved on and plans for the wedding became the priority, discussions about the joint last name were put on hold. Socrates promised to give the matter further thought, while Bella hoped in her heart that her future husband would spend his energy on the more practical issues in their lives.

The pressures of the wedding preparations soon became mixed with the tensions of the time. As the wedding date approached, dark clouds of doom began rolling in off the horizon. Another potential Holocaust for the Jewish people seemed imminent, as Arab states threatened to find a solution to the "Jewish problem" by wiping the state of Israel off of the map. The joy of the upcoming nuptials was tainted by a hatred generated thousands of miles away but historically too close for comfort.

War broke out in early June 1967. The darkness of the first day of the Six Day War was replaced one week later by the giddiness of having witnessed a miracle, for there was no other explanation for the military victory. Across the world, Jews as a people were experiencing something they had not felt for thousands of years, a sense of unity, a sense of strength, a sense of pride. Swept up in the spirit of '67, Socrates' mind was flooded with exuberance. With less than two weeks to go until their wedding, he suggested to Bella that they change their last name to Israel. Bella half-jokingly remarked that the name Israel was not a bold enough statement to capture the essence of the wave washing over the Jewish world. She suggested that they name themselves Jewish, and Socrates, not getting the joke, thought to himself that his wife was a genius.

And so, Socrates and Bella Rose Jewish were married in June 1967.

Having married Jewish, the next step of their unified Jewish adventure was to plunge themselves into study. They spent week after week reading every book they could find on their religion, their culture, and their history. It became apparent that Jewish tradition taught that understanding ideally came about through experience, and so they decided that their ultimate education would come through raising a Jewish child together.

On Tu b'Av, the Jewish festival of love, in the year 1967, Socrates and Bella conceived a child. One month later, the discussion began as to what that child should be named. By Rosh Hashanah, a unique name for their offspring continued to elude them. Socrates turned for inspiration to the Torah reading for the New Year. Within those texts there were traditional names like Abraham, Isaac and Samuel for a boy, and names such as Sarah, Rebecca and Hannah for a girl, but those names failed to capture the imagination that made up the Jewishes' marriage of minds. They were looking for something unique in a first name to match their unusual last name. Socrates thought that that the name of Abraham's brother's son, Yidlaugh, sounded like a perfect unisex name, but Bella quickly extinguished that creative spark.

And so, Yom Kippur came and went, and, faster than you can spin a dreidel, Chanukah arrived and departed. Reflecting on the Greek influence of that festival, and pondering the Greek origin of his own name, the seed of an idea was planted in Socrates' head. Perhaps there was wisdom in his parents' choosing to name him after a famous Greek figure. After all, the precedent was there in the Talmud, with many a rabbi having a Greek name. Inspired by the burden of suffering carried by his parents and his in-laws, Socrates spent the months after Chanukah contemplating naming his offspring Pathos, the ancient Greek word for suffering. On Purim, he raised that possibility with his wife.

"Just think about it," he suggested to Bella. "Every day in roll call at school, the teacher will call out to our child's fellow students: Jewish, Pathos. That act alone will serve as a lesson for our child's classmates, and hopefully stimulate much worthwhile discussion on issues such as sympathy and empathy for the Jewish People, two concepts rooted in the word pathos."

Like his father before him, Socrates failed to take into consideration the schoolyard bully factor in the process of naming his firstborn.

Bella, suffering from iron deficiency and numerous other pregnancy-related challenges, was exhausted and cranky by the time Socrates came up with his pathetic idea. The pressure of having to prepare their home for their first Passover as a family, as well as the anxiety of hosting her first seder as a married woman, did not help the situation. Her response, rooted in irony, was aimed at shutting him up.

"Listen, when God named the first human, he named him Adam. When God chose a man to bring monotheism to the world he chose Abraham. Both of these beginnings started with the letter A. What was good enough for God is good enough for me. So, based on your idea, we should name our child Apathy, which literally means the absence of suffering, which is what we both want for our child. I don't want to discuss this any further until we are done with Passover. Understand, Mr. Jewish?"

Socrates was intrigued. He liked the name and Bella's explanation for it. He decided that eventually Bella would too. So Socrates focused on helping Bella begin to prepare for Passover and did not give the naming process any further thought.

The joy of the night of the first seder was mixed with anticipation for the upcoming addition of to the Jewish household. Both sets of in-laws marvelled at the miracle that was Bella's bulging belly. At one point in the past, the grandparents–to-be could barely imagine surviving the hell of Europe, and yet, there they were, awaiting the birth of a grandchild while celebrating the Jewish festival of freedom in freedom.

Near the end of the festivities that evening, the three women went to the front door of the house to participate in the tradition of welcoming Elijah the Prophet to their home. While the women stood at the door, Socrates stood at the head of the table and began to recite the 79th Psalm. Just as he uttered the words "pour out," the Jewish baby took that as its cue, and Bella's water broke. Apparently, like its father, baby Jewish did not like waiting, and decided to arrive in the Jewish world earlier than expected.

Elijah followed the Jewish family to the hospital and told Socrates the following tale in the waiting room.

"After the final chapter of the story of Cain and Abel played itself out, Eve suffered in silence at the loss of both of her children. Barred from returning to the Garden of Eden by angels brandishing flaming swords, she settled into a life of acceptance in her new home east of Eden. When she gave birth to Seth, her labour was terribly hard. All of the physical pain that God had promised her as a consequence of the snake incident was combined with all of the emotional pain that comes from losing two children, and she screamed so intensely during the birthing process that she blew out the flames of the swords of the angels. The angels, seeing the flames disappear, assumed that this was the result of divine intervention, and, believing that their job was done, ascended back to heaven.

"One day, while working the fields after the birth of Seth, Adam saw that the entrance to Paradise was unguarded and told Eve. After some discussion they decided that they did not care to return to Eden. Having accepted their fate, they lost their opportunity to return to Paradise.

"Adam and Eve did not recognize the apathy that disguised itself as acceptance."

When hospital protocol allowed Socrates to visit with the mother of his child, he shared with Bella the strange tale told to him by Elijah, and looked to his wife to help him interpret its message. After a prolonged labour, Bella did not have any energy for theoretical explorations with her husband, so she asked him to let her rest and suggested that he, too, get some sleep to clear his head. Socrates decided that the best way to clear his head was to do something, so he proceeded to the nursing station and filled out the paperwork required to register the name of the newborn.

And that is how, in 1968, two decades after the regeneration of the Jewish state and one generation after the Holocaust, Jewish, Apathy was born.

Best Wishes for a

Passover

Entering Warsaw

Sylvia Schneider

It shouldn't be me
Seated softly in this bus
Cruising the streets of Warsaw.
It should be my father;
Who walked these streets before,
Who knew the lanes, stores, trees,
Who grew to swiftly ended youth
And slipped away from all he knew
And loved.
It shouldn't be me.

It shouldn't be me
Living softly in my life
A visitor to Warsaw.
It should be my aunts;
Four faces never seen,
Four voices never heard,
Eight hands that never touched
The niece they never knew
Or loved.
It shouldn't be me.

It shouldn't be me
Thinking softly in the night
Of the family from Warsaw.
It should be the grandparents,
Cousins, uncles, friends never known,
The teachers, writers, rabbis,
Artists, dancers, dreamers – who lost the world they formed
And loved.
It shouldn't be me.

It has to be me
Speaking softly in the night
Of the terrors of the past.
It has to be me.
They cannot weep the tears.
They cannot tell the tales.
They cannot ever touch
The hearts of those who live
And love.
It has to be me.

It has to be you
Listening softly to the words,
To the silence of the past.
It has to be you
Who turns history to truth,
Who teaches, shares what really was,
Who ends the hatred that denies -
Gives honour to the souls that lived
And loved.
It has to be you.

Balalaika

Joseph Peretz

There is an old Yiddish song in which a young man asks: "What can cry, cry without tears?" and the answer is, "A heart can cry, cry without tears – tumbalalaika, shpiel balalaika, freilich zoll zein."

For the past few years, I have had and still have plenty of practice, ever since my wife entered Baycrest, probably the best institution for the care of Alzheimer's patients.

Play Balalaika

We are both survivors of the Holocaust, and my darling suffered bouts of depression for many years, which she seemed to gradually outgrow.

The terrible war years left an undeniable impression when at the age of 16, she was left without family, all deported, and had to fend for herself, while I was interned in a German labour camp. But faith and fate brought us together. We were the first couple to have a chupah as soon as our city, Antwerp, was liberated six months before the end of the war.

Without anybody from whom to ask advice, we had to make all the decisions ourselves, one of them being the resolution to immigrate to Canada, the best country in the world, far away from the city where every street, every house, every corner, every park bench, brought back the painful memories of our dear loved ones who perished in Auschwitz. Once settled, we were inseparable, eating, sleeping, even working together, since she became the secretary in my burgeoning business.

We lived a beautiful life and saw our daughter get married. She gave us two granddaughters who in turn presented us with five great-grandchildren. We vacationed in Cape Cod and Ogunquit, travelled across Canada and California. We cruised the Baltic and the Mediterranean, celebrated anniversaries in Israel. We had subscriptions to what was then called the O'Keefe Centre, the Royal Alex Theatre and the symphony at Roy Thomson Hall.

Our happiness was marred by recurring bouts of what we thought was depression, which gradually worsened.

When playing Scrabble, my Baby (that is what I have called her since our first kiss in 1940) started putting words on the board that were not words at all, the first sign that something was very wrong. It got to the point that we had to hire a caregiver, a charming Ethiopian lady who became very devoted to my darling.

As her condition worsened, on the advice of my daughter and her physician husband, we inquired about admitting her to the Baycrest Centre. Initially, she was put on a waiting list and we were advised that it could be a long time before a room would be available.

Like a thunderclap out of the blue, the call came, much sooner than we had expected.

I wished that we both could have died. I cried with tears and without. My heart was breaking when we brought her to Baycrest, two days later.

Shpiel Balalaika

When a few days later, my daughter visited, my love asked her, with a smile, "How is your mother?"

A heart can cry without tears...

On days when her caregiver was off, my love would ask me to take off my shoes and lie down on the single bed and hold her. In a book of poems for seniors, it explained that that is also making love.

And now, her speech is affected and when she tries to say something, it sounds like "duh, duh, duh, duh, duh," while I try to understand what she is trying to say. And it kills me.

And then, some mornings, when she sees me come in, the words come out very clear when she says: "I love you," and I break down and weep. Weep without tears.

Tumbalalaika, shpiel balalaika

Moses

The story of Moses was no bed of roses
But oh! How he helped all the Jews
God appeared in a cloud, and made — good and loud
An offer he couldn't refuse

That was when Moses was a grown up man
But here is the way the story began
Pharoah of Egypt had issued some orders
Kill all Hebrew boys inside of our borders
Moses' mother made a nice little boat
Entrusted her baby in hopes it would float

A little baby in a cradle floating in a stream
Pharoah's Daughter near the water
It was not a dream
The baby would belong to her for better or for worse
A little girl who lived nearby found a baby nurse.

Of that little girl we later learned that baby was her brother
And the baby nurse she found for him was no one but her mother

So Moses was breast fed (no need for analysis)
And grew up like a prince in luxurious palaces
But he never forgot his kith and his kin
And so when God called him, he said, "God I'm in!"

There followed a tale of incredible bravery
And Moses led Hebrews out of Egypt and slavery
There were plagues, there were Matzohs, and parting of seas
Forty years in the desert and much worse than these
The story in symbols is there on the plate
And now we will tell it— the tsimmes can wait.

Autumn

Lord, I cannot look Upon Your glory,
But I can see
The Laurentian Mountains
In the fall
Covered with blazing maple trees;
They are the shield of Your magnificence.

Taschlich

Blasts of shrill, screaming wind rip bright yellow leaves from elms and maple and poplar, fling them in the creek overflowing with the deluge
as black clouds loose the weight of our regrets, each drop a tap, tap,
tap counting missed chances.
The storm-dredged creek is purged of debris;
trees are stripped clean and spare, clearing the way for ascending light.

Survival

It might have been a dream, a childhood dream.
But children dream of things they wish could be.
And close their eyes to things no child should see.
It had to be a dream, a fearful dream,
Where innocence would vanish in a flash,
And fantasies of childhood turn to ash.
Now, lest my soul should break, I must awake.

Little flower, little flower,
Let me hold you in my hand.
Bud of life, you spring from ashes,
Bleak and haunted, less than sand.

From a time too dark and brutal
For a carefree heart to know,
From a place too stark and futile
For a living thing to grow,

Sheltered by a hidden bower,
Nourished by a secret rain,
Little flower, little flower,
Holding you, I live again.

Magic seedling, tiny flower,
Trampled on and viewed with scorn,
Miracle of heaven's power,
You were destined to be born,
From the ashes . . . and a dream.
My Israel.

My Land Is

My Land is:
Like a young beauty
With sun sparkling
On her face,
With stars twinkling
In her hair.

My Land is:
Like the summer
Wearing a mantle
With brilliant colours
And a mystery veil
Of ancient splendour.

My Land is:
The reflection of the sea
And her waves of love
Are mirrored in the heart
Of everyone who once
Touched her Holy ground.

Synagogue of past

Sophie Seal

We were just kids, I well remember, just little girls decked out in our meagre finery, playing out front of the little shtibel, where our parents prayed for a better year, for something more suitable than this; this darkening night ahead;

inside, papa, one among the men draped in their taleisim, frenetically swaying and swirling and chanting before their sacred Torah, looking up to a supposedly present God, praying in the ancient tongue of their fathers—which hardly anyone understood but understood as something sacred—for a kinder fate. kids were allowed in that forbidden world to women—if only they kept real quiet...

upstairs, behind the black curtain of the women's section, full of familiar faces seeking forgiveness and salvation, mama sitting at the right side of her mima Bessie, her favourite aunt, a woman of valour; the only woman learned and righteous enough to merit the task of davening on behalf of the women; voice beatifically deep and melodious, punctuated by the women's wails, beating fists upon their chests, swaying back and forth, back and forth, mama shushing us to not say a word in the presence of such solemn protocol. how holy it all seemed then; a refuge, a somewhat calm retreat from the calamitous outside...

oh, where are those days; those devout and sanctimonious days, when dimly-lit, dingy, little sparse edifices paled the modern-day temple colossi regaled in their fine decoration, where irreverence of temple services pandering to the timorous and commercial are facing various degrees of extinction; where congregations attired in their newly purchased fineries, come duty-bound and hollow-hearted, just for the sake of "tradition"?

The hand of the scribe

Brandon Marlon

Seated on woven rugs or stone benches, hunched over vellum and parchment,
the scribe's face reflects oil lamplight, his wrinkles shadowed through the night.
In the quietude of his Babylonian village, the diligent amanuensis peruses scrolls, double- and triple-checking passages, scrutinizing scripture for consistency.
Midnight learns of a civilization's history, commemorated deeds of clans and tribes, morals enmeshed in generations of narrative,
the epic saga of a nation now mired in exile.
Pausing to relieve trembling phalanges, the scrivener glances through lofty aperture, contemplating the royal past of his people, searching the heavens for clues to their futurity.

I saw ten thousand soles today
On shoes in piles, in piles, in piles.
And all the soles cried out to me:
I want to walk.
I want to dance.
I want to skip and run a race.
I want to proudly cross a stage,
Or walk beside my papa to the chupah.
I want to creep into my daughter's room
And place her shoes beside her bed.
I want to tiptoe to the tiny crib
And see my grandchild's shining face.
I want to go to places that I dream of
And come home again to those who love me.
I want to walk.
But all the shoes lay still
In piles, in piles, in piles.

Welcome to Israel

Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein, standing, right, founder and president of the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, and Natan Sharansky, the head of the Jewish Agency, greet newly arrived immigrants from Ethiopia as they take part in a preparatory, mock Passover seder at an absorption centre in Mevasseret Zion, near Jerusalem, on April 2. [Flash90 photo]

Canadian champions Sephardi heritage

Reva Kaiser
Special to The CJN

Next month, an event at the U.S. Capitol building will pay tribute to Sephardi Jewry and its contribution to American Jewish culture and society.

A select group of individuals is slated to be honoured for their personal achievements within Sephardi society, and among them will be a Canadian, Yehuda Azoulay of Toronto, who will be recognized for his contribution to Sephardi literature and his involvement in Sephardi causes.

Azoulay, only 25, has already authored three books on Sephardi rabbis (one-fifth of his planned series) and countless articles on Sephardi leaders and history, in his mission to educate Sephardim (and all Jews) about Sephardi heritage.

He'll stand out as the youngest honoree at the May 16 luncheon, which is being organized by the Friedlander Group, a public relations firm that specializes in working with American Jewish groups, and will feature members of U.S. Congress. But Azoulay will be in heady company: the event will also be honouring two prominent Sephardi rabbis, Israeli Internal Affairs Minister Eli Yishai and fellow MK Nissim Zeev.

Brimming with the optimism and vigour of youth, Azoulay is enthusiastic about discussing this seminal project and directs me to his compact home office. Tidy, but crammed bookshelves cover every vertical space, except for a portion of wall showcasing a life-size portrait of Rabbi Ovadia Yosef. The former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel is considered by some to be the foremost present-day Sephardi leader and a reviver of Sephardi identity and pride

Divon Appointed

TORONTO — The Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (CFHU) has named Elan Divon, son of former Israeli ambassador to Canada Haim Divon, as executive director of its Toronto chapter, it announced last week. Elan Divon, a former senior campaign consultant for United Jewish Appeal in Toronto, will promote academic partnerships between Canada and Israel, CFHU said.

WORLD

Chain Drops Ahava

OSLO — A major retail chain in Norway has stopped selling "products originating from settlements in occupied territories," including Ahava cosmetics. The drug store chain VITA, which has 160 stores in Norway, made the move March 30. VITA is the main retailer of Ahava products in Norway, the Norwegian People's Aid and the Norwegian Union of Municipal and General Employees said in a statement on an Israeli boycott movement website, adding that "this decision will be a serious blow to the sales of Ahava products in Norway." The two groups lobbied VITA to make the move.

Sermon Slurs Jews

KUALA LUMPUR — An official government sermon delivered in mosques across Malaysia called Jews the "main enemy." The sermon, prepared and distributed by the federal Islamic affairs department and delivered March 30, said that "Muslims must understand Jews are the main enemy to Muslims as proven by their egotistical behaviour and murders performed by them." It also urged local leaders to increase awareness of the Islamic importance of Jerusalem.

Mezuzah Reversal

STANFORD, Conn. — A Connecticut condominium association has reversed its decision to prohibit mezuzahs on the doorposts of residents' units. The Stanford, Conn.-based California Condominium Association's agreement with residents had allowed the display of items on doors but not doorposts. This meant residents could affix Christmas wreaths and crucifixes to their doors, but Jews could not affix mezuzahs to their doorposts. The association had threatened to fine Jewish resident Barbara Cadranel $50 a day until she removed her mezuzah from her doorpost. Her lawyers said April 3 the matter was resolved. The association apologized to her and to the Jewish community for the discrimination, saying it wasn't aware of the significance of mezuzahs to Jews.

German Poet Slams Israel Over Iran

Gunter Grass

BERLIN — Gunter Grass, Germany's Nobel Prize-winning author, published a poem claiming Israel is endangering world peace by threatening Iran.

Critics, including Jewish leaders and politicians, charged Grass, 84, with turning truth on its head with his prose-poem claiming that "the nuclear power, Israel, is endangering our fragile world peace."

Published April 4 in Germany's Suddeutsche Zeitung newspaper and international papers, the poem, titled What Must Be Said, condemns German Chancellor Angela Merkel for subsidizing the sale of more submarines to Israel "justified as reparations."

Grass also said his reluctance until now to speak out against Israel was due to his own sense of connection with the Jewish state and that "the charge of antisemitism" is easily flung at those who criticize Israel.

In 2006, Grass admitted he had joined the Waffen-SS as a teen at the end of World War II. He was criticized for hiding the fact while accusing others of the same.

The Israeli Embassy in Berlin said the poem was in the "tradition of blood libel ahead of Passover," while Israeli Interior Minister Eli Yishai said Grass is unwelcome in Israel and barred him from visiting.

Yom Hazikaron ceremony to be upgraded

Important for Diaspora Jews to connect with Israel: consul general

Andy-Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israelis abroad and the Jewish state itself have been lax in conveying to Diaspora Jews the cultural importance of Yom Hazikaron, says Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, Amir Gissin.

He wants to change that.

Yom Hazikaron, Israel's Memorial Day, which commemorates those who have died in defence of the Jewish state and its victims of terror, "is probably the most important civic day on Israel's calendar," Gissin said. "To many Israelis, it's as important as Yom Ha'atzmaut [Israeli Independence Day, which is celebrated the next day]. It holds a central place in the Israeli psyche. Every Israeli either comes from a bereaved family or knows someone who has fallen in one of the country's wars," he said.

Gissin's family has lost six members to Israel's wars.

Speaking to The CJN at his downtown office last week, Gissin said creating a cultural rapprochement on Yom Hazikaron – April 25 this year – between Canadian Jews and ex-pat Israelis in Canada was one of his last and most important projects. (Gissin's term is up this summer, when he will return to Israel. He will be succeeded by D.J. Schneeweiss.)

Amir Gissin

He said there's a gap between the perception of the importance of the holiday in Israel and the way it is perceived in the Toronto Jewish community. It's a gap that needs to be closed, he said.

"The way to do this is to invest in an effort to bring the [Toronto] Jewish community to the Yom Hazikaron ceremonies" held around the city every year, he said.

As a result, he said this year, the consulate has helped move the major Yom Hazikaron ceremony to a larger venue that can hold up to 5,000 people. Beth Tzedec Congregation has agreed to host the ceremony, in conjunction with Holy Blossom Temple. In the week before the holiday, the consulate is launching a major advertising blitz targeting the entire Jewish community.

It's the first time the consulate has endeavoured to bridge this gap. And Gissin said this may end up being the largest Yom Hazikaron event in Canada, and perhaps even outside of Israel.

Meet David Goldbloom

From the editor's desk...

In 1953, the famous British theatre director Tyrone Guthrie became the founding director of the now much celebrated and internationally renowned Stratford Shakespeare Festival of Canada. On the ship that brought Guthrie to Canada, he met and befriended Alton Goodrich, the stage name of an accomplished Shakespearean actor as well as scholar of the Bard. Goodrich was from Montreal, a highly respected pediatrician and medical lecturer. He was also Alton Goldbloom.

Some 60 years after that chance encounter on the Atlantic ocean-liner between the Shakespearean actor-pediatrician from Montreal and the soon-to-be founding director of the Stratford Festival from London, England, the pediatrician's grandson has become the chair of the board of governors of the Stratford Festival of Canada.

The CJN recently met with the grandson at a restaurant near the University of Toronto, where he is a professor of psychiatry, to talk about the Stratford appointment.

David Goldbloom is a scion of a medical family that has now brought four generations of healers and physicians to the world. His dedication to restoring the health of others who are ill is widely known throughout psychiatric medicine and among his peers. His contributions to the field are legion. I mention merely some of his most recent contributions: in 1998, he was appointed inaugural physician-in-chief of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health in Toronto. When his five-year term expired, he was appointed the centre's senior medical advisor, education and public affairs. He has written more than 100 scientific articles and book chapters and has edited two textbooks for use by psychiatrists. As of two weeks ago, on April 1, Goldbloom has assumed the chairmanship of the board of directors of the Mental Health Commission of Canada (MHCC).

David Goldbloom is clearly a very distinguished scholar and leading practitioner of mental health. And he is very clearly quite busy. He accepts with earnest purpose the advancement of all of the causes for which he volunteers, of which chairing the board of governors of the Stratford Festival is an excellent example. It reposes very deeply in his heart.

"When I sit in the theatre, I feel great nachas. The kvell opportunities are legion and I feel part of a large family. The lights go dim. The audience disappears. You are drawn into the stage. I simply love the place and the people," Goldbloom told The CJN with a reverence for the theatre and the company that nearly shone from his face. "As soon as I arrive on Ontario Street [in Stratford], I feel a state of transcendence and calm," he added to emphasize the point.

David Goldbloom

In addition to Goldbloom's medical pedigree, he has also been stamped with a multi-generational imprimatur of music and theatre. It dates back to his grandfather, Alton, his great-aunt Ellen Ballon (the Montreal-born pianist/musician prodigy of the early 20th century) and his own father, a serious musician in his own right, as well as successful doctor.

Goldbloom grew up in a house of music. He studied piano for more than a decade until his mid-teens. He also studied acting in Montreal at Dorothy Davis and Violet Walters' school of drama. His acting "career" led him, as a teenager, to CBC television and later, during the summer, as a behind-the-scenes CBC announcer. During the exciting and heady days of his undergraduate years at Harvard University, he acted in musical comedies and immersed himself in theatre, literature and music.

"But, as an actor at university," Goldbloom said with a self-deprecating, straight face, "I received a lot of encouragement to go into medicine."

Years later, the arts, theatre, medicine, healing, literature, mental health activism and music permanently intertwined into his personality and character, David Goldbloom is serving the Stratford Festival. He now brings his uniquely articulate and helpful manner "to get people even more engaged" with the theatre company that his grandfather's friend Tyrone Guthrie helped found.

"I want to bring Stratford to the world, and along the way, bring the world to Stratford," he said. "I take immense pride in what happens on our [Stratford's] stages."

Using concepts that spring from his dedication to healing disorders of the mind, Goldbloom said, "Stratford gives us all the chance to explore the boundaries of the imagination because the theatre is not constrained the way real life is."

And then using a musical figure of speech that also obviously sprang from another part of his upbringing, he concluded our conversation by effusively, proudly, saying, "Stratford plays second fiddle to no one."

Pakistani journalist presents positive image of Israel, Jews

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A recent English-language item on Tariq Khan's news website, geared to a Pakistani audience, was a sympathetic story about Eva Sandler, whose husband, Rabbi Jonathan Sandler, and two children were killed by a terrorist in Toulouse, France.

Scan down the page and you'd find an article headed "Peace-loving Israelis march in Tel Aviv against war with Iran," along with another about the second concert Madonna has added during her tour of Israel.

Tariq Khan

In the Urdu-language portion of the website, there's an image of the Israel Defence Forces emblem and another of the Israeli flag. Nobody is burning the Israeli flag or stomping on the IDF logo.

On the contrary, said Khan, the Weekly Press Pakistan website (http://weeklypress-pakistan.com) offers stories that cast a positive light on Israel and the Jewish People. Khan believes the Ajmi, non-Arab Muslims, have no beef with Israel or Jews.

"We have nothing to do with the Palestinians. We have no feelings [for] them, and they have no feelings for us," he said.

A veteran journalist who worked for the Nawaiwaqt group of newspapers in Pakistan before moving to Canada in 2000, Khan believes there is no reason Jews and Pakistanis should not be friends. In Canada, he is dedicating himself to inter-community relations, and serves as director of the Christian-Muslim Forum of Canada. He has started a Shalom Israel group to promote friendship between the Jews and Muslims.

Jews, Muslims and Hindus got along well on the Indian subcontinent, and there is no reason that should not be replicated in Canada, he said.

So far his overtures to the Jewish community have been met with some hesitance. Jews, he said, have been "a little cautious and careful."

There's no ulterior motive, no hidden agenda. "We announced it in the online paper that we want friendship with the Jewish People, the Israeli people. We recognize Israel as the Jewish state. We want friendship – that's it," he said.

Khan has met so far with members of Congregation Darchei Noam and visited the synagogue. He's also consulted with Avi Benlolo of the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, who has been receptive – and cautious – about the overtures.

Khan has visited the organization's offices, Benlolo said. What's more, Khan has included articles Benlolo has provided on his website.

Since then, the centre "has had international Pakistani journalists contacting us for information on issues or to put us on an e-mail list," Benlolo said. They seem to be interested in learning more about Jewish history, Israel and the Holocaust.

The relationship with Khan is at a very preliminary stage, Benlolo continued. "Any opportunity to dialogue or build bridges with any community is a positive step… This is all step by step and [we are] as optimistic as we can be."

The chair of the Jewish unity committee of Darchei Noam, Andrea Spindel, has visited Khan's home and hosted Khan and other local Pakistanis at her home. Spindel believes Khan is genuinely interested in establishing good relationships with local Jews and changing the perception of Israel and Jews among Pakistani intelligentsia.

Several of Spindel's articles on Jewish life, including one explaining Chanukah, were published by Khan.

Through her work with Kulanu Inc., an NGO that aids Jews in remote communities, she's met Khan's nephew, Navras Aafreedi, who lectures on Jews and Israel in northern India. Both Khan and his nephew are ethnic Pashtuns, and they believe the Pashtun people are descendants of the lost tribes of Israel, Spindel said.

Khan does not deny the connection. The "Pashtuns are one or two" of the lost tribes, he said.

So is that why he's trying to improve relations with the Jews?

"The Ajmi Muslims have no bad feelings towards Jews… You have a problem with the Arab people."

Khan said that presenting an alternative, positive view of Israel and Jews in a Toronto-based website can have influence back in his homeland.

He intends to stir debate among Pakistan's top journalists, many of whom worked under him when he lived in Pakistan. He pointedly noted that when he worked in Pakistan, he constantly received Urdu-language press releases from a variety of sources, but never once from Israel.

It's clear his views on Israel and the Jews have prompted a debate, but judging from the comments in a Pakistani journalists group on Google, which carries his online newspaper, a good number of the reporters remain hostile to Israel and Jews.

Under the heading "When Pakistan will stop considering Israel as enemy?" several posters revived classic antisemitic stereotypes in the discussion. Not all the postings are negative and Khan believes his reputation in Pakistan will influence some journalists to take another look at their attitudes about Israel and Jews.

"Jews are the enemy of nobody," he said. Jews are behind many medical advances and "I don't know how many good things they are doing and passing it to all people."

New Vaughan JCC almost ready to open

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The Schwartz/Reisman Centre – the Jewish community centre (JCC) being built on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan – will open officially Oct. 14. But the centre, located at 9600 Bathurst St., north of Rutherford Road, will be open for some programs June 1 and will be the new home of Centre Camp this summer.

The day camp, which was housed near Avenue Road and Lawrence Avenue West following the closing of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre in 2009, has been renamed the Jack and Pat Kay Centre Camp.

The new 200,000-square-foot, $51-million building in Vaughan is adjacent to the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre. It includes a kosher café, three saltwater swimming pools (one outdoor and two indoor), a daycare centre, two full-size gyms, a conference centre, multi-purpose rooms, and underground parking for 350 cars, as well as an above-ground lot with 100 spaces.

In addition to JCC facilities, the building will also house the Koffler Centre of the Arts, Jewish Family & Child, JIAS, JVS, Circle of Care and a Mount Sinai Hospital wellness centre on the third floor.

Reena will be leasing space to run its adult programs in the centre as well.

David Sadowski, executive vice-president, Jewish Community Properties of Greater Toronto, describes the building as a "community mall" with the JCC as its anchor tenant.

The three-storey building was designed by Guela Solow-Ruda, who also designed the adjacent TanenbaumCHAT building.

The Schwartz/Reisman Centre features "an enormous amount of glass," and virtually all the components are Canadian-made, including limestone walls from a small quarry in Owen Sound, Sadowski said. He added that the east wall (facing Bathurst) is designed so that the building can be expanded outward. A theatre complex would be the last piece to be built, he said.

Sadowski also noted efforts to make the building inclusive. "You'll see a lot of wide corridors," he said, adding that the number of washrooms for people with disabilities is above the required code.

As well, the centre has adult change tables and a Snoezelen room, which is geared to people with a variety of special needs, noted Carol Seidman, director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Tomorrow Campaign, which helped raise the money to build the facility. The room is "a place of calming down, it's very therapeutic and we're really proud to have one," she said.

Seidman added that the centre has been built with money from donors and both the federal and provincial governments. "Every one of the [donor] gifts is a unique story. There are opportunities at every level to get involved.

"I think there's a misunderstanding that, unless you have hundreds and thousands or millions of dollars, you can't participate." She added that all gifts are payable over five years, and some are relatively modest amounts.

The centre and the surrounding Lebovic campus is one of three Jewish campuses that have been or are being built as part of what started as a $150 million campaign, Seidman said. "We changed the goal to $400 million, and we've raised $300 million."

The other two campuses are downtown and on Bathurst just north of Sheppard Avenue.

This past January, more than a year after the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) was torn down, construction had yet to begin on the building that will replace it, and federation officials were saying it won't open until 2016. Construction on the new JCC is set to start in 2013, but fundraising for the $110-million complex was about $40 million short as of the beginning of this year.

In Vaughan, the 50-acre Lebovic campus was purchased 12 years ago for $6 million, with funds donated by 44 families, Seidman said.

Sherry Kulman, executive director of the centre, said it has 1,350 individual members so far. "We are exceeding our targets," Kulman said. She expects to have more than 1,600 members by the time the centre opens, and said that the centre is financially viable.

Individual membership costs $69 a month, while a family membership is $144 per month. In addition to full membership, partial memberships are also available, such as pool and gym only.

About CHW Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) is Canada's leading Jewish women's philanthropic organization. Founded in 1917, CHW is non-political, volunteer driven and funds programs and projects for Children, Healthcare and Women in Israel and Canada.

Your Gift to CHW

Your Annual Campaign gift goes directly to projects for Children, Healthcare and Women in Israel and Canada - read a few stories from our beneficiaries, below.

Ben, an affectionate toddler attends the CHW Terry Schwarzfeld Ottawa Daycare Centre in Acco. Recently, it was discovered that Ben suffers from a degenerative eye disease, which will lead to his eventual blindness. Because of this, Ben receives one-on-one assistance so that he can participate in activities with the other children; he also receives guidance to help him with his disability. As Ben's family suffers financially, the daycare staff sends home leftover food, bread and vegetables; also advocating for the family when needed.

Because of CHW supporters, like you, Rachel received same-day testing, faster treatment and care.

Rachel, a 40-year-old, who recently arrived to Israel from Ethiopia, came to the CHW M. Fanny Breast Care Institute at Assaf Harofeh Medical Center after discovering a skin lesion on her breast. Biopsy results revealed that Rachel had Paget's Disease, a malignant condition. Further imaging found ductal carcinoma. In this instance, the only course was a mastectomy. Rachel was informed of her condition, and after consultation with her family and doctors, she decided to proceed with surgery, and breast reconstruction. Rachel is recovering well and is hopeful for an improved life with her family.

Because of CHW supporters, like you, Maya receives counselling, ensuring that she and her child thrive.

Maya, mother of 3-year-old Ora, noticed that her daughter was becoming increasingly aggressive, physically acting out, and talking back. Worried, Maya turned to the director at Ora's daycare centre, who suggested the WIZO Parental Hotline. Maya called and as she spoke with a volunteer, Idit, it was discovered that Maya's recent job loss and other stresses were affecting Ora. Idit suggested parenting techniques, such as setting boundaries and encouraged Maya to call back in a few weeks to discuss their progress, which she did.

What must be said

Time and again we have seen that Nobel Prize laureates may have skill, talent, extraordinary knowledge, brilliance and even genius in specific areas of endeavours. But none of these qualities, singly or cumulatively, guarantees in them wisdom, common sense or even good taste.

Thus, we saw the octogenarian German Nobel laureate for Literature and former Waffen SS member, Gunter Grass, last week pose politics (and prejudice and polemics) as art in an utterly offensive poem called What Must Be Said. The poem was published in several European newspapers last week.

Grass' key message to the world, what he considered so urgent for all of us to hear, what he ordained so imperiously must be said, was an indictment of Israel. It was the Jewish state's putative nuclear capability and not that of Iran that presents a threat to world peace. As a result, he urged his government to refuse to further sell any submarines to Israel that might add to Israel's arsenal.

The poem appropriately evoked wide criticism at home in Germany and abroad in Israel. German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle said of Grass's views that "putting Israel and Iran on the same moral level is not ingenious but absurd." Marcel Reich-Ranicki, one of Germany's leading literature critics, said Grass' poem was "disgusting."

Israel's prime minister offered his own literary criticism of the Grass poem. "His declarations are ignorant and shameful and every honest person in this world must condemn them," Benjamin Netanyahu said.

"In Iran there is a regime that denies the Holocaust and calls for the destruction of Israel," Netanyahu added. "It is Iran, not Israel, which poses a threat to world peace. It is Iran, not Israel, which threatens to destroy other countries. It is Iran, not Israel, which supports terror organizations that fire missiles on innocent civilians. It is Iran, not Israel, which supports the massacre that the Syrian regime is carrying out on its civilians. It is Iran, not Israel, which stones women, hangs gay people, and ruthlessly suppresses the tens of millions of citizens in its country."

Israel's interior minister, Eli Yishai, declared Grass to be persona non grata, offically unwelcome in Israel. Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said of the poem and of its writer that it was the "egoism of so-called western intellectuals, who are willing to sacrifice the Jewish people once again." Nor did it go unnoticed by the Israeli embassy in Berlin that the poem was published on the eve of Passover, suggesting it carried on the odious "tradition of blood libel ahead of Passover."

The simple truth of the poem of course and its publication is that it pulls away the very thin veneer from Grass' foul-smelling pedantry and transparent posturing. Grass has a high reputation as a writer. But what he peddles is unembellished and very low anti-Israel politics. This is what really must be said.

25 years ago in The CJN

Chaim Herzog went on a five-day official visit to West Germany, becoming the first Israeli president to set foot on German soil. As part of the trip, Herzog went to the site of Bergen-Belsen, the Nazi concentration camp. He was an officer in the British Army unit that liberated the camp.

Assad champions human rights

It seems as if the entire world watches and observes on a daily basis the slaughter of innocent civilians in Syria at the hands of the Bashar Assad regime. The one exception is the United Nations and its associated body, the Human Rights Council (HRC), where there is an inability and an unwillingness to condemn the Syrian government for the atrocities being committed over the past year. To add to this absurd situation, is the fact that on March 23, the HRC formulated a resolution denouncing Israel for alleged violations of human rights on the Golan Heights. The issue was brought before the council by a representative of the Assad regime. This, while more than 8,000 Syrians have been murdered by Syrian government forces and tens of thousands of Syrians have sought refugee status and asylum in Israel's Golan Heights. It should be noted that 55 per cent of the members of the HRC are Muslim countries. The membership includes Libya, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Cuba, China, Kyrgyzstan, Uganda, Djibouti, Senegal, Mauritania, Malaysia and Russia. Of course, it is universally recognized that these countries are the bastions and protectors of human rights within their own countries.

Author rejected chassidic roots

I was greatly saddened by the article "Breaking away from the Satmar" (March 29), about Deborah Feldman's bestselling book, Unorthodox, in which she chronicles her rejection of the Satmar world of her childhood and embracement of secularism. Orthodox Judaism encompasses a spectrum of philosophies and lifestyles. While, arguably, the Satmar represent one extreme, there are multiple Orthodox communities in which one does not encounter primitive "gender roles, restrictions in education, racism, homophobia [and] anti-Zionism." It is a pity that Feldman thought she had to become completely secular in order to "achieve authenticity and self-determination." One can enjoy the richness of secular culture, embrace diversity and find fulfilment as a woman in horizons beyond one's home and community, while still keeping the beautiful, daily rituals that have preserved Judaism throughout the ages and serve as a constant reminder that we are beings created in God's image and must behave accordingly.

More on Schwartz's

I found the article "Landmark deli Schwartz's enters new era" (March 15) very interesting and thought I would add my two cents' worth to the history of Schwartz's. Seventy-eight years ago, I was a student at Devonshire Public School, in Montreal. My parents owned a lunchroom, but every Friday my mother gave me 15 cents to have lunch out. As soon as the lunch bell rang, I would dash out to the Montreal Hebrew Delicatessen, where I enjoyed a smoked meat sandwich and a Coke. The article is correct – the deli was owned by Reuben Schwartz. It consisted of a store with four tables. At the time, there was another deli owned by a Mr. Schwartz, where Schwartz's is now. I don't know the reason for his leaving the store, but that is when Mr. Reuben moved to the present location and the legacy of Schwartz's began.

Teaching the Holocaust

I strongly commend the efforts of the Holocaust Museum Houston in running the Butterfly Project ("Butterfly Project recalls children killed in Shoah," Feb. 24). Working with survivors and volunteers to gather 1.5 million butterflies to commemorate the deaths of the 1.5 million children who were murdered in the Shoah is an important mission. As a 15-year-old history student who is learning about World War II, I realize the importance of carrying on the memories of the Holocaust. It shocks me that there are young people whose knowledge of the Holocaust is limited, and the steps that the Butterfly Project is taking to change that are truly remarkable. It infuriates me when people claim that the Holocaust is old news and that Jews should stop making a fuss over it. Not only is the Shoah still relevant to genocide that is occurring today, but it is an event that will forever mark the history of humanity. We cannot let it fade out of our hearts and minds or risk this type of event occurring again.

Tunisia's Jews wary of political events

A growing and increasingly vocal Islamist movement

Armin Rosen
JTA

Tucked on a quiet side street blocks from the Mediterranean Sea, the last kosher restaurant in the Tunisian capital is a thriving centre of Jewish tradition in a country of 10 million with nearly an entire Arab and Muslim population.

Yet Jacob Lellouche, who has owned and operated Mamie Lily in Tunis since it opened 16 years ago, says his business is hardly a Jewish bubble.

Most of his customers are Muslim, and on a recent Thursday night, the restaurant's cosy dining room is dominated by a large party of Tunisians sipping boukha – a fig-based liquor that Tunisian Jews traditionally drink on the Sabbath – while chattering in Arabic and French. Lellouche says the guests are liberal activists who have come to the restaurant to draft a statement on freedom of speech in the aftermath of the revolution that toppled Zine Abdine Ben Ali's regime in January 2011.

"The civil society in Tunisia sustained the Jewish community of this country," says Lellouche, explaining that relations between Tunisia's educated and politically engaged citizens and the country's 1,500 Jews have always been mutually beneficial. "As long as there are Jews in the world, there will be Jews in Tunisia," he says.

But more than a year after Tunisia became the first Arab country to overthrow its dictator through a popular, non-violent uprising, two religion-inspired political movements are challenging Tunisia's cosmopolitan political and social attitudes, and are threatening to reverse the country's long-standing moderation toward Israel and the Jews.

Located just 80 miles off the coast of Sicily, Tunisia has been colonized by foreign powers from the Roman Empire to modern France. But unlike other countries with a long colonial history, Tunisia has historically been a place where Middle Eastern and European values and ideas have converged, reinforcing one another without causing conflict or social discord.

Educated Muslim Tunisians acknowledge that the Jews are a crucial part of this history.

"The Jews came to Tunis and developed commerce and trade here, and many came after they were expelled from Iberia," says Abdel-Hamid Larguech, a history professor at Manoura University. "These were factors in how Tunisia became more cosmopolitan."

Kedya Ben Saidane, who has researched the country's Berber community, claims Berbers living in Tunisia first began practising Judaism nearly 3,000 years ago.

Modern Tunisia has subsequently had a history of moderation on Israel-related issues. In 1965, Habib Bourguiba, the president from 1957 until 1987, caused a brief crisis in relations between Tunisia and several other Arab governments when he outlined a plan for recognizing Israel in exchange for the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Official diplomatic contact between Israel and Tunisia, established in 1996, lasted just four years, yet Tunisia does not take as hard line a position on the Jewish state as other Arab countries.

"Tunisian Israelis come here with no problem at all," says Rabbi Haim Bittan, the leader of the small Jewish community in Tunis, adding that travel to Israel is fairly routine for the country's Jews. Tunisia is also one of the few Arab countries accessible to Israeli passport holders, despite the lack of official recognition.

Yet since Ben Ali's ouster, there have been hints that Tunisia's moderation – and its moderate position toward Israel – could be eroding.

Rached Ghannouchi

In October, the Islamist Ennahda party won 43 per cent of the vote in Tunisia's first post-uprising parliamentary elections, putting an explicitly religious party in charge of a country with a long-standing secular and republican tradition.

Although Ennahda in late March officially dropped its demand for Islamic law in the country's new constitution, many Tunisians still fear that the party could take the country in an uncomfortably radical direction.

Party co-founder Rached Ghannouchi has publicly praised the mothers of suicide bombers and spoken about "the extinction of Israel."

"Ennahda's election favoured the emergence of a new fundamentalist section of the society, the extremists," Larguech says. "And the two enemies of the democratic revolution are populism and extremism."

Ennahda confirmed moderates' fears by proposing a constitutional ban on normalization of ties with Israel during a mock parliament held just after Ben Ali's ouster. A year later, there is almost no mainstream support for such a provision. Ennahda, which has proven responsive to the criticism from the country's large secular-liberal wing, also now opposes the normalization ban.

Walid Bennani, vice-president of Ennahda's parliamentary contingent, says his party believes that peaceful relations with the Jewish state would be possible as soon as Israel makes peace with the Palestinians.

"The constitution is not the place to legislate relations between countries," he says.

However, Ghannouchi said recently that there could be no normalization with Israel, according to the official TAP news agency. "Tunisians' problem is with Zionism, not with Judaism," he reportedly said.

Jacob Lellouche

Tunisia also has a growing and increasingly vocal Salafist movement. Tunisia's Salafists are Islamic fundamentalists inspired by Saudi Arabia's restrictive version of political Islam who felt oppressed by the secular, republican character of the Bourguiba and Ben Ali regimes. On March 23, Salafist protesters chanted antisemitic slogans in downtown Tunis, provoking a tense standoff with a group of artists gathered in front of Tunisia's national theatre.

Every major political party, including Ennahda, condemned the Salafists, whose chants included "death to the Jews." A week later, Salafists called for a ban on normalization with Israel in a protest in front of the National Assembly building in Tunis.

> 'The Salafists have now chanted death to the Jews during their marches three times'

So far, Tunisia's moderate and secular political culture has kept the Salafists on the social and political fringes while frustrating Ennahda's ambitions for an overtly Islamic constitution. And as far as the Jews are concerned, Tunisian moderation has endured during the transitional period.

In Tunis itself, Jewish life is more developed than in most other Arab capitals. Although only 500 Jews remain in the city, it boasts a Jewish school, a yeshiva and a kosher food service – as well as the Grande Synagogue de Tunis, a 1930s art-deco masterpiece still topped with a colossal, gilded Star of David. The southern island of Djerba has more than 350 students in Jewish schools, according to Rabbi Bittan.

The post-revolutionary sense of openness has yielded one major gain for Tunisia's Jewish community. After Ben Ali stepped down, Lellouche launched Dar el-Dekra (Arabic for "House of Memory"), which he describes as the first Tunisian organization aimed at celebrating and promoting the country's Jewish heritage.

"Ben Ali used to instrumentalize the Jewish community," Lellouche says. "Ben Ali wanted to say to France and America that the Jews live till now in Tunisia because he wants them to live here."

With Ben Ali gone, there's a new opportunity to develop Jewish life in Tunisia without contributing to the public image of a widely despised autocrat, says Lellouche, who is also planning a Jewish museum.

Still, he remains wary.

"The Salafists have now chanted 'death to the Jews' during their marches three times," Lellouche says. "The first two times they were talking about Zionists. But I think the third time they were talking about the Jews themselves."

Israeli teens face things Diaspora peers don't

A couple of weeks ago, while attending to a problem with my cellphone, I had a chance encounter with a guy who made aliyah from Toronto around the same time as I did. I run into him about once a year.

Besides the hassle of dealing with a defective phone, my acquaintance seemed more preoccupied than he usually is when I see him. It turned out he'd had a pretty sombre morning at the IDF induction office here in Jerusalem accompanying his second son as he began three years of military service in the tank corps. His first son, a 20-year-old, already serves in a combat unit. It had been a heavy morning.

I travel in different circles here in Israel. Mostly, my family, friends and associates are sabras – Israeli-born. But others immigrated to Israel as young adults, many from English-speaking countries. The majority of these veteran "new" olim did not serve in the IDF or only did short stints of duty. As they approach the age when their kids are completing high school and contemplating what to do next, some of these parents are perplexed, unable to help their kids decide which units they should aim to get into or what to do when they experience difficulties once they're in the military. They simply don't know enough about the multifaceted ins and outs of the IDF.

Because I served in the IDF professionally for 24 years and learned a thing or two about Israel's military labyrinth during that time, I'm often approached by bewildered parents needing guidance and support about their kids' tour of duty.

Yair Lootsteen

in Jerusalem

Some are anxious and need to know it's OK to be that way. Their children are in combat units and won't tell them anything about their service because they aren't allowed to. They know their kids are doing dangerous things. They're losing sleep over it, and like many other Israeli parents, they no longer travel abroad together. One parent is always in Israel – to deal with any eventuality that might arise.

Most of my friends' kids want to make their military service a meaningful experience. The boys who can (yes – they're still boys) covet elite combat unit positions. The girls also want to give of themselves, some, too, in combat roles, others in sensitive intelligence corps units, or as human resource specialists or helping less privileged soldiers with socioeconomic woes, to name but a few of the options open to them.

They give their parents tremendous pride. A friend recently called to tell me her daughter, who serves in a non-combat position in the Gaza division, will be recognized this coming Yom Ha'atzmaut as one of the entire divisions' premier soldiers. Her mom, who can't tell the difference between a brigade and battalion, let alone a division, wanted to know how good that is. I told her that it's amazing.

Other parents don't know how to handle their kids' frustrations regarding the military. Those can be myriad. Many young people don't get chosen for units they'd hoped to get into. Others want out of units once they get into them. Some have medical problems and don't think the army's taking care of them properly. Others can't deal with being ordered to do things they don't want to do by kids not much older than they are. For the first time in their pampered lives, they can't ignore such orders. And yet others find the going too tough physically or emotionally. They want out – now!

And their uninitiated parents don't know how to help them, or who to turn to. They're just as exasperated and annoyed, and they worry.

These years of military service are a challenging, complex journey for kids and their parents – sometimes turbulent, often rewarding, but certainly not idyllic.

And in a nutshell, my friends, that's the difference between living in Israel and living in the Diaspora. Your streets are usually cleaner. Your cars and homes are larger. Your bureaucracy is a bit less onerous, and, generally speaking, your bank accounts are more padded. But we, too, live well and enjoy the good things this country has to offer, and I for one would not want to switch places.

But while Canadian teenagers are busy choosing between McGill and U of T or Queen's and Dalhousie, Israeli youths are choosing between Golani and Givati, pilot training, submarines or paratroopers.

May they all come home safely.

In every generation, we must tell the story

I have often tried to imagine how the Israelite slaves in Egypt responded to the Ten Plagues, the midnight flight and sudden Exodus into the unknown desert, the splitting of the Sea of Reeds with Pharaoh's army in hot pursuit, and the abrupt transition from bondage to freedom.

Slavery was all that they and numerous generations before them had known. Suddenly, appearing out of nowhere (actually, the Sinai Desert) and without any primary elections or other democratic processes, an Israelite named Moses, speaking like an Egyptian, claimed to have received divine instructions to become their leader and to negotiate on their behalf with Pharoah. But instead of improving their situation, this only made it worse, as their taskmasters added to their workload and the overall suffering.

When the plagues began to cripple Egypt, did the majority of Israelites, who were mysteriously protected from the worsening crisis, worry that their all-powerful overlords would eventually exact revenge? Did they organize demonstrations and sign petitions against Moses, Aaron and the other elders while apologizing to the Egyptian masters for any inconvenience? How many were able to grasp the scale of these events and their significance, and to go beyond the immediate traumas and fears for the future in an entirely different and unknown environment? Did the Independent Israelite Voices for Peace refuse to leave with the others, or did they depart briefly and then go back to the security of slavery?

In recent generations, more than 3,500 years later, the Jewish people are again in the middle of tremendous historic events. The Shoah, the return to the Land of Israel and re-establishment of national sovereignty after 2,000 years of exile, accompanied by the ongoing wars and threats of extinction, are all wrenching changes in our individual and collective existence. This suffering includes mass terror attacks, barrages of missiles from Gaza and Hamas, and the cold-blooded murder of Jewish children.

In our exodus, the Jewish people moved from exile and subjugation into freedom and self-determination, embodied in the State of Israel, with all of its faults and growing pains. For the majority of Jews around the world, Israel has become the centre of their religious, cultural and national identities – about half of the world's Jewish population now makes their home in Israel. Millions more identify closely with Israel, weigh in on the efforts to adjust diverse traditions to the demands of a modern democratic society, and contribute to or benefit from the rich Jewish cultural renaissance.

But for some Jews, the modern mix of afflictions and triumphs is too overwhelming to deal with, and they focus on more immediate and local concerns. Their relationship to Israel is limited, distant and sometimes alienated. For a small but influential group with access to the media and funding from hostile non-governmental organizations (NGOs), Israel and Jewish independence is a burden and an embarrassment. Their minimalist Jewish identity remains deeply embedded in the Diaspora.

Gerald Steinberg

in Jerusalem

Today's Jewish and Israeli counterparts to Moses' critics are unable to cope with the requirements of freedom and self-determination and look to a generally hostile "international community" to impose their interests and policies on the rest of us. These post- and anti-Zionists travel the world, denouncing Israel on university campuses, in United Nations frameworks, and in some churches, supporting the BDS movement as a means of keeping the Jewish nation in a state of political slavery.

But history does not move in reverse. "Independent Israelites" who stayed in Egypt quickly disappeared, as did those who turned around in the desert and returned to the house of bondage, embittered and angry. Similarly, in our times, Jewish history is moving in one direction. We have witnessed terrible suffering leaving the Diaspora and regaining freedom. And while Israel is not yet the perfect Jewish and democratic state that has been imagined, what we have managed to accomplish is still miraculous.

Letter from the Lower East Side

A bustling bastion of new immigrants streaming into New York City, the Lower East Side has been settled by a succession of ethnic groups since the 17th century.

The Dutch, followed by the British, were the first to live in this now-congested southeastern corner of the island of Manhattan. Next came the Germans – who inhabited the first tenements – Irish and Italians, who lent it more flavour.

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, this neighbourhood gradually changed, becoming virtually synonymous with eastern European Jews, whose shops, synagogues, institutions and kosher or kosher-style delicatessens marked it as a predominantly Jewish enclave.

Sheldon Kirshner in New York City

On iconic streets such as Delancey and Hester, newly arrived Jews learned to be Americans as they shed old ways and habits. With the onset of prosperity, Jews moved on, their places taken by, among others, Chinese, Polish, Ukrainian, Puerto Rican and Dominican immigrants.

Of late, a process of gentrification has taken hold as crumbling but architecturally interesting buildings are renovated, stodgy shops are remodelled into trendy and pricey boutiques and brand-name cafés establish beachheads. Who knows what the Lower East Side will look and feel like in another generation?

Despite the changes, the Jewish component of the Lower East Side is still very much in evidence, as my daughter and I discovered during a long and leisurely stroll through its precincts recently.

On a wooden bench outside Yonah Shimmel's Knish Bakery on East Houston Street, we kept hunger at bay by sampling its potato and mushroom knishes, steaming, mushy and delicious.

We wandered into Russ & Daughters, a few doors away, a mecca of smoked fish. On Orchard Street, a hub for bargain shoppers, a heady aromatic brine emanated from Guss' Pickles.

On a more spiritual level, the Lower East Side is still replete with synagogues, such as the Bialystoker and Greek shuls on Willet and Broome streets.

At the corner of Broadway and Rutgers stands what was perhaps the most important landmark in the entire area, the 10-storey beige and yellow brick Forward Building, which faces Seward Park, the first municipal-built public playground in the United States.

Designed by George Boehm, and finished in 1912, this striking Beaux Arts structure was the headquarters of the Jewish Daily Forward, the Yiddish newspaper of record in the United States. As a child in Montreal, I remember my father and uncle reading the Forverts from cover to cover.

Founded in 1897 by socialists, the first edition was published on April 22 of that year. Widely regarded as the successor of New York City's first Yiddish-language socialist newspaper, Di Arbetier Tsaytung, the Forverts was driven by a social democratic editorial agenda.

One of its first editors, Abraham Cahan (1860-1951), was born in the Russian empire, in what is now Lithuania. The scion of Orthodox Jews whose grandfather was a rabbi and whose father was a Hebrew teacher, Cahan was steeped in Jewish tradition and seemed bound for the rabbinate.

Abraham Cahan

Drawn to secular culture, Cahan studied to be a teacher in Vilna. He graduated in 1881, when nationwide pogroms broke out, and found a teaching job in Vitebsk, where the painter Marc Chagall was born.

Being a socialist, Cahan was eager to leave repressive and antisemitic Russia. Arriving in New York City in 1882, he earned a living as an educator and writer, contributing articles on socialism and science to Di Arbeiter Tsaytung.

He also began writing fiction. His first novel, Yekl: A Tale of the New York Ghetto, was published in 1896 to critical acclaim, with the influential critic W.D. Howells comparing him to Stephen Crane (The Red Badge of Courage).

Cahan's second book, The Imported Bride and Other Stories, appeared two years later. It, too, was hailed by critics.

In the meantime, Cahan joined the staff of the Forverts, but left abruptly in a dispute over its political orientation.

Having learned English sufficiently well, he offered his services to a daily, the Commercial Advertiser, where he worked for four years, honing his skills as reporter and observer of the American scene.

He returned to the Forverts after receiving iron-clad assurances of full editorial control. Under Cahan's editorship, it became the single most important Yiddish newspaper in the United States, its circulation reaching 120,000 in 1912.

One of its most popular features, Bintel Brief, encouraged readers to send in questions on life's pressing problems. The column was designed to help Jewish immigrants adapt to life in America, one of the mandates of the Forverts.

In its heyday, during the 1920s and 1930s, its daily circulation skyrocketed to 275,000, a figure that has never been matched by any Jewish publication in the United States. But as Jewish immigration to the United States slowed to a trickle, due to nativist restrictions, its circulation suffered, dropping to about 170,000 by the eve of World War II.

The Forverts was blessed with a stable of gifted writers, including Isaac Bashevis Singer, whose short stories were enjoyed by many readers.

Cahan retired in 1946, having written his major novel, The Rise of David Levinsky, and his memoirs, The Education of Abraham Cahan. By then, the Forverts was something of a spent force.

Circulation declined to 56,000 by the early 1960s and to 5,000 at last report. A weekly English edition surfaced in 1990, but a Russian version did not survive.

The Forward Building

The Forward Building, adorned with deeply inset windows, ornate pilasters, marble columns, a huge clock that lights up at night and golden letters in Yiddish that spell out Forverts, is truly a relic from another era.

Sold to Chinese investors years ago, the once mighty building, now in a mainly Asian neighbourhood, has been converted into a condominium whose units have sold for between $600,000 and more than $5 million. Like upscale condos in the Big Apple, it has a 24-hour doorman. But like prewar condos, it has no balconies or an underground parking garage.

As I walked toward the building, my daughter's dog, Rainbow, leading the way, I passed a profusion of Asian food markets, electronics stores and a Chinese funeral home, where a band in frilly white uniforms stood outside playing dirges to a departed member of the community.

Listening to the sorrowful music, I wondered how many people around here had ever heard of the Forverts or Abraham Cahan?

As Bob Dylan put it in his plaintive ballad, "The times they are a-changin."

Deepening our Judaism by engaging with Israel

Michael Diamond
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

It is 2005. I am sitting in a large room in Eilat on a Friday night. I am interested in Eilat because it is the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's partner city in Israel. The room is filled with perhaps 40 people and we are participating in a prayer service. And while the room is somewhat plain and hardly compares to some of the grand sanctuaries in Toronto, it is striking that the service is being run by members of one family, including both the parents and their teenage children. I like the feel – everyone is involved, everyone cares.

But what strikes me most is the self-assuredness and competence of one of the teenage daughters who is leading much of the service. Rosy is a natural leader, and her intellect, confidence and self-awareness are impressive.

Later that night I reflected on our very comfortable corner of the Diaspora in Toronto, and wondered how many of the 200,000 Jews here understood the "real" Israel. And it hit me that this young person, so vibrant and bright, would do a lot of good spending time on a campus like my own Holy Blossom Temple, where a synagogue, a supplementary school and a day school live together.

How wonderful it would be for young people such as this to spend time in Toronto bringing the real Israel, and the young Israel, into the hearts and minds of many Toronto Jews who have had limited exposure to Israel and whose relationship with Israel may be limited to what they read in the media!

Back in Toronto, I took the idea forward and received the enthusiastic support of both Holy Blossom and the federation to pilot the program. The idea of bringing young, pre-Israel Defence Forces Israelis to the Diaspora was not new, but we were going to do it differently, in a concentrated way that would bring the real Israel into the hearts and minds of thousands of Toronto Jews by introducing them into synagogues, day schools and Jewish camps.

The young Israeli emissaries at Leo Baeck, from left, Mai Levi, Or Shalem, Michal Cohen and Ariel Levy.

With that, in 2007, UJA Federation's Young Emissary Program (or YEP) was born. It was to become the foundational piece of the federation's Israel engagement initiative!

That pilot year at Holy Blossom was a success, made possible by the excellence of our first two young emissaries, one of them that same Rosy, and the support of Holy Blossom, Leo Baeck and Camp George.

Fast forward to 2012.

The YEP has now grown to 14 Grade 12 graduates who spend their pre-IDF "gap" year in Toronto, working with more than 20 partner institutions – synagogues, day schools, youth groups and Jewish summer camps. Space does not permit me to write about the positive impact these young Israeli stars have had on these communities. Countless numbers of young Toronto Jews, as well as many adults, have developed much stronger relationships with Israel through the personal contact they have had with the young emissaries.

The excellent relationships that have developed between the federation and these 20-plus Jewish institutions have provided us with an opportunity to build a community-wide Israel engagement initiative that will change the nature of the Toronto Jewish community's relationship with Israel for the longer term.

And with the formation of the Israel engagement committee in 2011, we set out to encourage our institutional partners to consider going beyond the Young Emissary experience, and move toward being fully Israel engaged, one institution at a time.

For an individual, being Israel engaged means that you have developed a relationship with Israel that is healthy, can withstand the stresses of the day-to-day interactions with a secular world that questions Israel intensely and often unfairly. It means that you can understand and accept Israel's imperfections and realize that, like all states, the State of Israel is imperfect and that those imperfections are OK because through it all, Israel remains an open, democratic and pluralistic state. It means that you have a relationship with Israel that is healthy because it's based on the real Israel of today. It means that you both "hug" Israel and "wrestle" with it.

When you hug, you love, and you are justifiably proud. When you wrestle, you consider the imperfections, learn about them and perhaps even try to do something about them.

Goal is to involve Jewish institutions in GTA

As is the case with a close personal relationship, if you are Israel engaged, your relationship with Israel is healthy because it is based on truth and reality. Most importantly, Israel engagement is a powerful tool that reinforces one's relationship with Israel in ways that deepen one's Jewish identity.

For an institution, being Israel engaged means the need to build healthy relationships between the institution's stakeholders and Israel is front and centre. It means empowering stakeholders to be unafraid to ask the difficult questions in the cozy confines of a classroom or a meeting room. It means understanding that the difficult questions must be asked and discussed in order that we Jews can achieve the knowledge required to develop the relationships with our homeland that will surely deepen our sense of Jewishness. It includes integrated Israel education, open dialogue about Israel and with Israelis, and related professional development.

Today there are several Jewish institutions that have seen the wisdom in moving toward becoming Israel engaged: Leo Baeck and Robbins Hebrew Academy started their processes in 2010, and we began to work with Holy Blossom as well in 2011.

Additional day schools and synagogues are committed to start working with us in 2012. Our ultimate (and perhaps naive) goal is to have every Jewish institution in the GTA ultimately become Israel engaged.

Being Israel engaged does not mean taking a particular political position related to Israel. Rather, it means that the important questions are being asked and discussed. We do not attempt to prescribe what is to be said or thought. We cannot do this, even if we wanted to – there are too many right answers, too many points of view, and our young people are not going to accept prescriptive thinking.

Some have suggested that there's a risk in taking such an open approach. But we believe there is a much greater risk in avoiding the tough questions. If we do not ask the tough questions ourselves, others will ask those questions for us and the answers may be problematic and often based on misinformation, distortions, or outright lies.

Out of this concern for building healthy relationships with Israel, and by doing so deepening our Jewish identities, and out of the fear of losing our young people to the vagaries of an aggressive and misinformed secular world, we have no choice but to encourage our Jewish institutions to make Israel engagement a priority.

And we must banish from our underlying personal assumptions the idea that Israel must be perfect. No state can be perfect, let alone a state that has absorbed the highest number of immigrants per capita and has endured the most significant number of existential threats of any state in recent history. We should expect imperfections, understand them and attempt to help correct them.

Too many of our high school graduates, including those who have had otherwise excellent day school educations, arrive on campus only to find that they do not have the knowledge or the understanding to withstand the onslaught of negative publicity about their homeland. These challenges necessarily impact on their Jewish psyches. Some of those students take the initiative and become effective advocates in response. As many, it seems, go in the other direction and become pawns or even leaders of our enemies.

But most simply walk in the other direction and take no notice, content to party on and/or focus on their studies rather than jumping to the defence of our Jewish homeland. And while we can criticize this large group for their lack of involvement, we must also recognize that we have perpetuated this situation by our actions. Because of our failure to focus on building healthy relationships with the real Israel, we have sent an implicit message to our young people that understanding the real Israel does not matter enough to make it a focus of their education.

> Important questions about Israel being asked

The Israel engagement committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, with the support of the Jewish Agency for Israel and the consul general of Israel in Toronto, and in partnership with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, the Centre for Jewish Education and the Centre for Jewish Camping, is focused on changing the Israel engagement paradigm in the GTA.

Please wish us well – for the sake of the Jewish People, for the sake of Israel and for the sake of all of our young people who deserve to have a deep, positive and healthy relationship with their homeland that will surely enhance their sense of Jewishness and deepen their Jewish identity.

IN JUNE OF 1942, ANNE FRANK PENNED THE FIRST ENTRY INTO THE RED CHECKERED DIARY SHE HAD JUST RECEIVED AS A GIFT FOR HER THIRTEENTH BIRTHDAY.

Now one of the world's most widely read books, Anne Frank's Diary of a Young Girl has engendered musical compositions, works of fine art, biography, fiction, poetry, dance and film. Jeffrey Shandler and Edna Nahshon will trace the transformation of the diary that Anne Frank kept for two years during World War II, until her arrest and deportation, into a posthumously published book, first issued in 1947, and the official dramatization of the diary for the Broadway stage, which debuted in 1955. These first efforts to make Anne Frank's life and work available to the public established important precedents for how millions of people approach Anne Frank.

Baycrest dance competition raises $1.5M

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

It was a grand night for dancing and for raising money at Dancing With Our Stars in support of Baycrest's Innovations in Aging and Brain Health.

Four spirited philanthropists and their professional dancing partners from Toronto Dance took the stage March 29 to compete for Baycrest's dance trophy at the Allstream Centre at Exhibition Place in Toronto.

Warren Kimel is seen dancing with his professional dance partner Tanya Iaremchuk. Kimel won Baycrest's Dancing With Our Stars trophy.

Warren Kimel, chair of Baycrest Foundation, won the trophy based on the money he raised, the judges' scores, and the votes of the 660 guests that attended.

The other participants were Canadian Football League commissioner Mark Cohon, Rogers Media president Keith Pelley and philanthropist Sarah Perlis.

Baycrest raised more than $1.5 million from the event, bringing the cumulative total for the three seasons of its Dancing With Our Stars to more than $4.5 million.

"I am so excited to have experienced my first Baycrest Dancing With Our Stars gala since arriving at Baycrest last fall," said Susan Sutton, president of Baycrest Foundation and Baycrest's vice-president of global institutional advancement.

"I heard so much about this incredible Baycrest fundraiser, and it exceeded all my expectations. The success of this event is due to the hard work of our co-chairs, Honey Sherman and David Cynamon, our courageous dancers, our incredible staff, and of course our generous sponsors and supporters."

A series of short videos was presented to the enthusiastic guests that highlighted Baycrest's breakthroughs in care, research, education and innovation.

"I think our guests went home with a clearer picture of why Baycrest is a global leader in aging and brain health," Sutton said.

Kimel said the event was a fun experience. "Baycrest is such a great cause and I'm happy to do whatever I can to help. I am so grateful to all the people who supported me and help me raise over $700,000."

He said that he "started practising twice a week more than two months ago, then three days a week, then four, then five, until we were practising twice a day for the last two weeks."

The fundraiser featured celebrity host, actress and comedian Andrea Martin.

The special guest judges were CityTV's Breakfast Television co-host Dina Pugliese, actor and former National Ballet of Canada principal dancer Rex Harrington, and professional ballroom dancer, choreographer, actor and past judge on CTV's So You Think You Can Dance, Jean Marc Genereux.

Yeshiva starts joint learning-career program

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Yeshiva Darchei Torah, an Orthodox boys' high school, has embarked on a partnership with Hadracha, a privately funded non-profit organization that offers free career, employment and business counselling to the Jewish community.

The new initiative combines the school's morning "Beis Medrash" (learning) program for post-high school males with career counselling in the afternoon. The organization will prepare "career destination reports" in areas such as accounting, MBA studies, the computer industry, construction trades and law, with information to help students choose a career path.

Hadracha, which launched formally in November 2010, was started by a small group of young yeshiva graduates, two of whom had lost money after starting a business together, according to Yis Cohen, the organization's executive director.

They realized that if they had received more information ahead of time, they could have been more successful, he added.

Although training and aptitude testing are available in the greater community, Cohen, who used to manage JVS Toronto's Parnassaworks Canada, its Jewish community initiative, said that many people in the Jewish community don't avail themselves of those opportunities.

Graduates of Darchei Torah typically go to Israel for one to five years of learning after graduation, according to the school's executive director, Jeff Toledano. When they return, a number of them continue their Jewish learning on a part-time or full-time basis and pursue secular studies in the evening or online.

More than 85 per cent of Darchei Torah graduates apply to university, and of that group, more than 95 per cent are accepted, Toledano said.

Hadracha will "help the boys identify more clearly what their choices are."

The Hadracha/Beis Medrash program is open to graduates of other yeshivas too, Toledano said. He noted that the school's location, a five-minute walk from the Wilson subway station, is an asset.

The school originally approached Hadracha about setting up a partnership, Toledano said, noting that "when a young man goes to yeshiva for two or three years and comes back, sometimes what he wanted to do when he was 17 isn't what he wants to do now... This will help the boys zero in on their interests."

As well, Cohen noted, it's important for clients to know their strengths and weaknesses. "You might want to think about finding a business partner whose strengths complement your weaknesses, or making sure you hire one."

Cohen, Hadracha's only staff person, sees all incoming clients (to date almost 300 people) and has a growing list of individuals willing to work as mentors. He said Hadracha is "a useful mechanism for linking people."

When considering a career, Cohen said, personality is "probably the strongest element that should be considered."

In the Orthodox community, and particularly in the chassidic community, young people have "often internalized more strongly the Jewish component" of their education and have not focused as much on the secular component. Hadracha's services offer "a tool they can use to make future-oriented decisions about where to direct their energies."

"It's a tough economy," he added. "The cost of living Jewishly is enormous."

Further information is available from Yeshiva Darchei Torah, at 416-782-7974, ext. 227, or Hadracha at 416-839-2500.

The true lesson of Dayeinu

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz

Our Jewish calendar is replete with beautiful and meaningful holidays, but Pesach has a special place in our hearts, minds and especially our homes. More than any other holiday, there are aspects of Passover that are common to all and those that are unique to our own families. We all have special seder traditions.

I'm always impressed by the degree of care so many have about Pesach observance. And despite the contemporary trend of going away for the holiday, for many of us, with our families dispersed throughout the year, there's no place like home for Pesach. Nothing beats that feeling as the house bursts to receive one and all. It's a special time that's worth the effort.

Pesach draws family and friends together for a common experience and shared traditions, and for this alone we should say "dayeinu" – it would have been enough – and "amen."

Indeed, there's probably no seder on Earth that doesn't sing out a rousing chorus or two of Dayeinu. The words of the rest of the Haggadah might slip by, but Dayeinu gets our attention.

Dayeinu means you can't have it all. It means you can be satisfied with less than you think is your due. Dayeinu means that life is a series of small steps, and we're constantly on the move. It means to stop and say thank you for what we have, which is always more important than what we think we don't have. The ability to say "dayeinu" creates yamim tovim, great days that last a lifetime.

Each phrase of Dayeinu describes something that would have been an accomplishment on its own. That is, all but one. "If you had just taken us to Sinai and not given us the Torah, dayeinu, it would have been enough."

Rabbinic Reflections

You're joking! Without the receiving of the Torah of what value is Sinai? Yet every year we sing it. But what are we really saying?

This verse encapsulates the essence of Jewish life through the ages. Consider that 3.5 million Jews came to Sinai as one people, and, totally united, they camped at Sinai. For that alone we say "dayeinu."

Equal to, if not even more important, than the various laws is the Torah of unity, of mutual respect and a sense of togetherness. If we could only achieve that, Torah would be even more meaningful.

Just think: around the world on seder night, irrespective of our traditions, we share common concepts of freedom, family, Jewish pride and tradition, and of the welfare of Israel and the Diaspora. This forges a sense of unity and mutual commitment. On Pesach, as at Sinai, every Jewish family is one. Dayeinu. It's enough to jumpstart the next glorious phase of Jewish destiny.

Imagine a seder of life with a feeling of dayeinu, of gratefulness and appreciation, of unity and mutual respect bridging our differences long after the Pesach dishes are stored away. Yes, we can continue the yom tov quality of Dayeinu, grateful and thankful for every day, so as to create a sense of good in the days, to come.

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz is spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal.

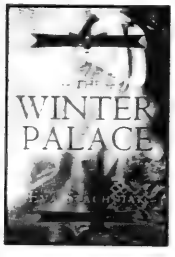
THE SHARON COLE MEMORIAL LECTURE



Guest speaker, prize-winning author Eva Stachniak, will discuss her most recent best-seller, The Winter Palace, a novel about Catherine the Great.

The Winter Palace is a passionate novel that illuminates, as only fiction can, the early life of one of history's boldest women. It tells the epic story of Catherine the Great's improbable rise to power - as seen through the ever-watchful eyes of an all-but-invisible servant close to the throne.

Arguing with God

God's justice often appears mysterious and cruel. Why do the evil prosper? Why do the righteous suffer?

Starting with the Bible, and including the protest literature from medieval and modern times, Judaism has a rich and pervasive tradition of calling God to task over human suffering.

The name "Israel," applied to Jacob, the progenitor of the 12 tribes, literally means, one who "wrestled with God." The theological and ethical wrestling in which the angry and apparently betrayed Jew argues with God begins with such biblical figures as Abraham, Moses, Elijah, Jeremiah, Job and the Psalmist. It continues with rabbinic questioning in the Midrash and Talmud, in the literature of the Middle Ages, and with horror about the Holocaust in our own day.

Living in the shadow of the Holocaust dims our perception of Jewish suffering in the past. But previous generations have known immeasurable sorrow. Think of those who have suffered and died in the wars against the Romans, in the Crusades to redeem Jerusalem, in the Chmielnicki rebellion that ravaged communities in the Ukraine and Poland in the 17th century, in the Russian pogroms, etc.

Where is God? A talmudic master named Raba stated, "Master of the Universe! O God! We have heard with our ears, our fathers have told us what deeds you did perform in their days, in the days of old – but as for us, with our own eyes we have not seen it."

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

One of the most famous of the chassidic prayers of protest is Rabbi Levi Yitzhak's "Din Torah mit Got" (a lawsuit with God) in which he asserts, "And I, Levi Yitzhak, son of Sarah Berditchev, say, from my stand I will not waver, and from place I shall not move until there be an end to this exile."

Ellie Wiesel has declared that "the smoke of Auschwitz has obscured the view of Sinai." Wiesel in all of his work urges his readers to accept the dilemma and learn to live it as well. "Perhaps someday someone will explain how Auschwitz was possible. It still remains the most disturbing of problems."

Some years ago in an interview, the renowned author Isaac Bashevis Singer declared that when Moses broke the Tablets this was an act of rebellion. The Jew does not recognize that might is right even if it is divine might. There is in the Talmud the expression: "One does not give heed to a heavenly voice." When we feel that we are right and God is wrong, we are allowed to say so.

Singer continued that, in a way, the Torah, the Law, is of higher importance than the maker of the Law and of the world. The Jews revere God, but he does not cringe before Him, he considers himself a partner to God and the Law. "The Holy One, blessed be He, the Torah, and Israel are one." There is great depth in this conception of Jewishness. We don't surrender to God unconditionally. We must know the terms.

The anguish of the true believer is greater today than ever before. It is important for God to hear these honest prayers. Perhaps, it is even more important for human beings to enunciate them.

Beware of the general's son

My View

Laurence Hart

That he trades on his illustrious family's name is apparent even in the title of his soon to be released book, The General's Son (Just World Books, 2012). Miko Peled is an Israeli-American whose father, Matti, fought in Israel's War of Independence in 1948 and who was himself a brigadier-general during the 1967 Six Day War. His grandfather, Avraham Katsnelson, was an early Zionist leader and a signatory to Israel's Declaration of Independence.

His pedigree might arguably suggest that in a Miko Peled we would see an indefatigable defender of Jewish interests in a modern Jewish state, wrapped in the mantle of a committed and passionate Zionist. Sadly, such an assumption would be entirely illusory.

Instead, Peled is emerging as a new face for various anti-Zionist groups and their fellow travellers. Promoted, somewhat pretentiously, as "an Israeli peace activist," he toured Australia late last year, and recently he was in Ontario, speaking at McMaster University and the University of Western Ontario during Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) programs on these two campuses.

In some ways, modelling his diatribe along the lines of the so-called "new" (post-Zionist) historians, Peled is able to weave a tapestry of convoluted logic, revisionist history, inherent bias and wilful exaggeration into a simplistic agglomeration of deliberate misstatements and outlandish fantasies that are, at best, ludicrous and, at worst, utterly perfidious.

But what most notably separates him from the post-Zionist historians, or other historians for that matter, is that he is not a historian, nor does he appear to have academic qualifications of any other sort. Nonetheless, it's easy to see – based at least on his presentation at McMaster, where he spoke to a packed auditorium – how his brashness and charisma more than compensate for his glaring lack of credibility in discussing matters as serious and intellectually challenging as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

As we've come to realize, mostly through bitter experience, events like IAW, whether on our campuses or in our public squares, are designed to incite, rather than to educate and inform. And with this as the yardstick, we might expect to see much more of Miko Peled. In what he writes and says, he doesn't hesitate to accuse Israel of "apartheid" practices, he encourages a comprehensive boycott of the Jewish state, he rants that "ethnic cleansing is a process that takes place every single day in the West Bank," he blames Israel for having initiated the wars of 1948 and 1967, and he calls for the international community to "recognize that the IDF is a terrorist organization and its officers are war criminals." In his "lecture" at McMaster, he warned that those who associate themselves with Zionism will eventually be shamed into admitting they were wrong, and that they should "remember to go down on their knees and beg for forgiveness when the trials begin and the tribunals take their seat."

It's troubling that Peled's distortions have attracted attention and large audiences. It's he, not us, who should be ashamed. His fabrications, masquerading as facts, are abhorrent, and it's time that his vile, solipsistic tirades against the very fabric of Israel and its supporters should be seen for what they are and robustly condemned.

Dining out on kosher apps

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Last time we looked at apps that help you shop kosher and keep a kosher kitchen. Today we eat, with the help of a few more apps. All are free and iPhone/iPad compatible unless otherwise noted.

Dining Out

Several apps do a fine job helping you locate kosher restaurants and provide contact info, maps and more.

Kosher Near Me: Automatically detects your location and produces a list of nearby kosher establishments. If you're going on a trip, you can type in a zip code (unfortunately, not postal codes) to find kosher restaurants at your destination. [http://bit.ly/koshapp9]

Kosher GPS (iPhone and Android): Similar to Kosher Near Me but you can select local restaurants, synagogue services and mikvah information. Allows you to search by city name. [http://bit.ly/koshapp10]

Kosher Free: Includes info about kashrut supervision and brief reviews that you are invited to contribute. [http://bit.ly/koshapp11]

Parve (or not)

You're ready to eat. But should you? These apps tell you when you've waited the prescribed amount of time between meat and dairy.

Basar VeHalav: $.99: Start Basar VeHalav ("Meat and Milk") and the countdown clock will tell you when it's time to indulge. Since various communities have adopted different traditions about waiting times, you can modify each of the four timers to signal you after one, three or six hours or a customized waiting time. [http://bit.ly/koshapp12]

ParveOMeter: This app is free, boasts a cooler name and better background about the concept of mixing meat and dairy. Unfortunately, its timer is not customizable like Basar VeHalav's. [http://bit.ly/koshapp13]

Blessings (before)

One more thing. Before we dig in, know the proper brachah to recite. These apps help.

iBlessing, $.99: You are first presented with a photo of a dinner setting. Click on the wine, bun, fish, vegetables or desert, and you'll hear the correct brachah recited in Hebrew and English. But wait, there's more. The Instructions section presents an overview of the types of blessings over food, while Info explains the philosophical concepts behind them. [http://bit.ly/koshapp14] iBless Food, $4.99: This app nicely complements iBlessing. Although most people know that you say Hamotzi over bread, blessings for other foods are not always so obvious. What do you say for calzone or chicken salad or pineapples or stuffed cabbage? This app has the answers. When you think you've got the hang of it, try out the Blessing Quiz. [http://bit.ly/koshapp15]

Blessings (after)

Now that you're done eating, it's time to say the blessings after meals.

iBirkat: A good, basic Birkat Hamazon app. It includes the complete blessing (in Hebrew only) along with Boreh Nefashot, which is recited after eating certain grain dishes. You can select the liturgy of your benching according to your background: Ashkenazi, Nusach Ari, Sephardi, Oriental and Yemenite. [http://bit.ly/koshapp16]

Bentching app, $2.99: If you want to splurge, you can purchase this app, which includes the complete text in Hebrew and transliterated Hebrew. What sets it apart is listening to a cantor recite the entire Birkat Hamazon. What I didn't like: I found it difficult to skip ahead in case you want to pray faster than the cantor. What I did like: Hearing the cantor sing part of the Shir Hama'alot using a tune from Les Misérables. [http://bit.ly/koshapp17]

Consulate has booked star power

He said this year's ceremony will be altered slightly from previous versions, where mostly Israelis were in attendance. While it will retain its sombre mood, the consulate has booked some star power.

"It's a very Israeli event by nature, almost Spartan. It's low-key and very emotional. There won't be fireworks, and those who've attended before know what to expect. But this year, we added some more English content," Gissin said. "It will include poetry readings, messages from Israeli diplomats, and we will have three chazzanim from three different synagogues, Beth Tzedec, Holy Blossom and Beth David, singing. This is something that will bring people together."

Guests include jazz vocalist Sophie Milman, who will sing Hatikvah, and former Canadian cabinet minister Stockwell Day, who is scheduled to read the prayer for peace in the State of Israel.

"So we are attempting to make this more appealing to the Jewish community while not changing the nature of the ceremony. Hopefully, non-Israelis will be able to connect with it personally and emotionally," Gissin said.

He also said it's important to realize that Israel isn't trying to create the "same type of emotional commitment" to Yom Hazikaron that Israelis feel, as it's obvious that many in the Diaspora have never experienced army life and the challenges that come with it.

But "everyone has lost a dear one in their life. That's the connection. The [Diaspora] community knows how to come together as one for Yom Hashoah. Or when there is a terror attack in Israel, they get involved and care about Israel.

"But Yom Hazikaron happens every year, and it's both personal and national. While you may not know individuals [who have died in Israel's wars], you should be able to connect with Israel nationally on this subject. The country has developed a culture around Yom Hazikaron, which exists to enable the public to mourn together. Even if you don't know someone who died, still you can feel a connection to the wholeness of Israelis who stand together in mourning because the people who died made the ultimate sacrifice so that Israel can continue to exist."

Gissin said he believes it's important for non-Israelis to attend the Yom Hazikaron ceremony because it provides a tool to connect with Israelis emotionally instead of only rationally.

"If you care about Israel, connect with what Israelis care about. And to all Israelis planning to attend, we say bring a non-Israeli friend."

JIAS heads north to aid newcomers

Meir Shenhav
Special to The CJN

I'm early for my meeting with Joanna and Lea, so I'm sitting in the Jewish Immigrant Aid Service's (JIAS) north office waiting room.

A young couple is sitting in front of me. We struggle a bit not to stare at each other, yet there's something in the air. After awhile, we find ourselves chatting loudly in Hebrew. That is, Danny and I are. His wife seems quiet and worried.

"So," I ask Danny, "what brings you to JIAS?"

Danny smiles. "We want to feel connected to a local Jewish community here in Thornhill Woods. We'd like to get some information about Jewish education for our kids, plus other programs that will help them integrate."

"Meir?" Joanna Sasson-Morrison, the co-ordinator of community development services, enters the waiting room. "Please, come in."

With us in the room is Lea Soibelman, a JIAS social worker. I start the interview for The CJN.

What was the reason for opening the new branch in the north?

Sasson-Morrison: We opened our north office at Bathurst and Rutherford because many current clients who originally settled in Toronto have moved to York Region. Plus, many families arriving today choose York Region as their first home. Recently, we also have a large number of sponsored parents (new immigrants to Canada sponsored by their Canadian resident children), who go to live with their children in York Region. All of these newcomers prefer to receive immigration, settlement and integration services closer to home.

How many families are registered here?

Soibelman: We're serving close to 200 families, in addition to our LINC (Language Instruction for New Canadians) and ESL students who receive services at our York Region school at Dufferin Street and Steeles Avenue. We expect our numbers to grow, as many studies indicate that this area is projected to continue receiving high numbers of newcomers. Our services include individual and family counselling, as needed. For youth and children, we refer to appropriate services in York Region.

What kind of services does this office provide compared to those at the other JIAS office?

Soibelman: All of the same services are available in our York Region office (as in our other office). It's a matter of providing the services in the location most convenient for our clients.

Draw me a typical profile of the clients in this branch.

Soibelman: We serve many Israeli families with young children. Also, the majority of sponsored parents are now residing in York Region. This is a change from the past when the majority of sponsored parents lived in Toronto.

Are there any activities to help newcomers blend into the community?

Sasson-Morrison: We run a variety of programs to help newcomers integrate into the community, such as English language programs, Conversation Café, youth groups, parenting seminars, Homework Club. We also hold workshops on the Canadian school system, getting ready for employment, etc. We serve as liaison with a number of community agencies, and refer our clients when appropriate.

Do you encourage the local community to volunteer with the immigrant community?

Sasson-Morrison: We welcome volunteers to participate. Our Homework Club and Conversation Café programs rely on volunteers. There is also a wonderful opportunity with our Family-to-Family for a local family to be matched with a newcomer family to share experiences together. JumpStart mentors are matched with newcomers from a similar professional program to help them learn about the Canadian labour market.

Does JIAS share any special programs with other Jewish organizations?

Sasson-Morrison: Our B'yachad program seeks to connect newcomers with different Jewish day schools and supplementary schools. We work with families, teachers and the administrations of the schools to ensure the child's success in a particular school. We have a wonderful partnership with National Council of Jewish Women. Their volunteers distribute parcels for Passover to our newcomers (as well as to many other individuals in need) to help them celebrate the holiday.

Will you be launching any new programs soon?

Sasson-Morrison: "When the Schwartz/Reisman Centre opens on the Lebovic campus (on north Bathurst Street) this fall, our York Region services will move there. We'll be a part of a community service hub providing services alongside other Jewish community agencies. We look forward to this innovative and integrated approach to service delivery.

On my way out I meet Danny again. He looks satisfied.

"I've learned something about kol Yisrael chaverim (all Israel are friendly to one another). Our kids will have wonderful opportunities to partake in community programs," he says.

And for the first time, his wife smiles.

Harnessing your third factor

I wanted to do an episode of "Hockey Bliss" on my show Finding Your Bliss. I started by aiming for an A-plus and was hoping to get Toronto Maple Leafs right-winger Phil Kessel on the program.

I think the words I was told were "dream on," but I kept going, because I thought of all the kids, and one in particular who I'm related to, who I know love hockey. I thought it would be so cool to get a great hockey player on the show who would inspire other kids to aim for the stars.

I also tried a number of other A-list players and alumni, but it just wasn't happening. If I did a show that focused on ballet, I know I could have whipped it together faster than a pirouette. But hockey is not really my sphere. And there's something else. I love hockey because of all the lessons it has to share.

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

Hockey is about sportsmanship and being part of a team. It's about fair play and determination, hard work and focus, discipline and the desire to do well. Hockey is a great metaphor for life. Because I think if you really work at it and put in the practice, you will succeed. If you shoot for the stars, you will score. And what happens when you don't win? What are the lessons that are even more profound when it doesn't go your way? This is what I was pondering when it was midnight on the day before my script was due and the hockey show just wasn't coming together. I tried everything, including connecting with every contact I have in the hockey world and even in the "anything that could be possibly be related to the hockey world." Sometimes, it's just not meant to be. But I'm not giving up yet.

One great thing this led me to was connecting with sports psychologist Peter Jensen, author of Ignite the Third Factor, an incredible book that not only has hockey lessons but also has life lessons for all of us. The book talks about the fact that there is a third factor beyond nature, and nurture, and that it is all up to you. How do you harness your own third factor when things don't go your own way? The book looks at what is possible, not what isn't. There is really no growth in life without adversity. An accomplished athlete is able to ignite their third factor. And I would put forward as a coach, when you're stuck on a chapter, or struggling with weight loss, or haven't scored a goal in several games, that is when you have to harness your own third factor. Well, I gotta go now. I have to get in touch with former Leafs captain Matt Sundin. Think he'll take my call?

ההצגה שיקפה את המלחמה ההיא, את השילוב בין הצברים ילידי הארץ לבין יוצאי השואה שזה אך הגיעו, דרך סיפור אהבה נוגע ללב אם גם מאד צפוי.

חלפו מאז 65 שנים. את הספר "הוא הלך בשדות" אי אפשר להשיג, כי למרות שמשה שמיר זכה בפרס ישראל בשנת 1984- אין לספר מספיק ביקוש. ישראל ממשיכה להיות ארץ אוכלת ושוכחת סופריה.

מי שמקימה את "הוא הלך לשדות" לתחייה היא ביתו של משה שמיר, יעל פיינגולד, שמביימת בימים אלה את ההצגה של אביה בתיאטרון "המפגש" של טורונטו. מה אגיד לכם- רק זה כשלעצמו מרגש אותי מאוד. ואם לשפוט לפי הצגותיה הקודמות בטורונטו, מחכה לנו חגיגה אמיתית!

להצגה, שתעלה החל מה 20 במאי כדאי לכם להזמין גם את חבריכם שאינם שומעים עברית- כי היא תלווה בתרגום סימולטאני.

לכרטיסים: 416-804-9346.

הפרוייקט של עידן רייכל

זה שאמן ישראלי איכותי מסוגל להביא אלף חמש מאות אוהדים, ברובם ישראליים, לשלם מאה דולאר למופע- זהו הישג משמעותי ביותר. זהו קודם כל הישג לרייכל עצמו, ויחד איתו ל"מותק הפקות" יציר רוחה של רביד דהאן שמזה מספר שנים מביאה אלינו הופעות של אמנים איכותיים, מה שעוזר לקהל היותר סלקטיבי לתת בה אמון, גם אם אינם מכירים את האמן מקרוב.

בראיונות עיתונות אמרה דאהן שמטרתה היא להראות לעולם את הפנים היפות של ישראל, בצילם של נסיונות החרם והדעות הקיצוניות נגד ישראל. זה היה מצויין כמובן אם להופעות היו מגיעים שונאי ישראל ומקטרגיה, אבל מאחר שלהופעות באים ישראלים ויהודים שמוכנים לשלם מאה דולאר להופעה- מטרה נעלה זאת של הפצת ישראל היפה תישאר כנראה בלתי מושגת. אבל מי אנחנו שנלין- אחרי שנים רבות מידי סופסוף מגיעים לטורונטו אמני השורה האמנותית הראשונה בזכות "מותק".

בהופעה של עידן רייכל השמיע האמן רק מספר שירים שהקהל מכיר ומוקיר מתקליטיו הקודמים. רוב ההופעה כללה מוזיקה חדשה, ובעיקרה קצבית וקופצנית, כששלושת זמרי המצויינים מזמינים את הקהל לעמוד, לקפוץ, למחוא כפיים ולהשתולל.

יד על הלב- זו היתה בעיני החמצה גדולה.

בתור מי שרואה אמנים בינלאומיים רבים- הקונצרטים שלהם הם תמיד תמיד תמיד שילוב של לפחות חצי-שני שליש חומר ידוע, וטפטוף זהיר של חומר חדש. קהל מעולם איננו אוהב חומר חדש שאיננו מכיר, ותמיד מתרגש מביצוע מקורי של שירים שהוא מכיר.

אני מקווה שזה לא ישפיע על התלהבות הקהל בהופעותיו הבאות. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Comedian talks about surviving breast cancer

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Marla Lukofsky, a standup comedian for 30 years, makes her audience laugh and cry.

Since 2008, she has turned her energy from standup to sharing her journey with breast cancer, which she was diagnosed with in 1998 at age 42.

She will be speaking at an event sponsored by Life2, a Richmond Hill educational group, April 18 at 8 p.m. at the Rouge Woods Community Centre, located at 119 Shirley Dr. in Richmond Hill.

Marla Lukofsky

Lukofsky talks about her experience with humour and pathos, she said, "taking the audience on a rollercoaster of emotions. Their brains start spinning. I give them a lot to think about."

Single, with "no children that I know about," she calls her humour self-mocking and witty. She has performed standup across Canada and the United States, and has represented Canada at international comedy festivals in Scotland and England.

She turned her current act into a one-woman show, she said, 10 years after surviving cancer, and after she had written a memoir. "My friend read it and said I should turn it into a speech, so I did.

"It's funny, it's sad, and it's informative. I talk about early diagnosis and screening, and how to talk to someone who has cancer."

She said that she receives letters from people commending her for her honesty. "One that stands out is from a 17-year-old boy whose aunt had been diagnosed with cancer. He hadn't been able to talk to her, but after hearing me, he gave her a call."

Lukofsky said a doctor in India read her story, which was published in a U.S. medical journal, and he asked for a videotape of her reading it.

"He is showing it at a conference. This is a very big deal. It will be broadcast across the world. They want to know my story. The doctors have said that the stories help doctors and patients."

She said that she feels like she's making a difference. "I help people feel less alone, and sometimes I even help save lives. My story transcends so many levels. It is really a story about facing a diversity."

JOB OPPORTUNITY Program Facilitator

Beth Sholom SYNAGOGUE

Beth Sholom is a traditional Conservative Synagogue in mid-town Toronto.

Reporting to the Executive Director, he/she will be responsible for developing and implementing programs for congregants of all ages taking place both within and outside the synagogue. Through the implementation of successful programs and events, the individual will be a goodwill ambassador, uniting the membership and creating a strong sense of community.

Exceptional organization and time management skills with attention to detail are a must for the position. Proficient computer and social networking ability with strong communication and interpersonal skills and a positive attitude are indispensable elements for a successful candidate.

The successful candidate has a university degree or combination of education and relevant experience. A strong Judaic background and at least two years' experience in facilitating programs and events are required. He/she should have a proven ability to work well under pressure of high volume and respond quickly to changing priorities.

This is a full-time position which requires flexible work hours and weekends.

Please send your resume with a cover letter in confidence to barbara@bethsholom.net before April 20th, 2012.

Ryerson project documents survivors' stories

Compiled by CJN staff

When Fairlee Ritchie, a Presbyterian minister, decided to enrol in Ryerson University's continuing education program, she never expected to forge a relationship with a 92-year-old Holocaust survivor.

But through the Sustaining Memories Project – a pilot program designed by the Azrieli Foundation and Ryerson in which graduate and mature students work collaboratively with Holocaust survivors to help produce their written memoirs – that's just what happened.

Ritchie teamed up with Leon Rotberg, an Auschwitz survivor, and together they wrote about Rotberg's journey out of Lodz, Poland to Germany, where he endured forced labour constructing the Autobahn until he was sent to Auschwitz in 1943.

After the war, desperate to leave Germany, Rotberg and his family sought a new life in a new country, only to be denied entry into a number of countries. Canada finally accepted him and his two brothers.

Today, Rotberg lives in the Kensington Place Retirement Residence, a Jewish retirement home.

"People have often told me that I was someone they could talk to," said the 59-year-old Ritchie.

"What I have always loved about the ministry was the pastoral work and research, so this project was a natural step. The first time we met, Leon asked me why I was doing this. I said I'm not Jewish, but I care. We [Christian people] have not treated you well over the centuries, but this is a story I want to hear, and I think others do, too."

Ritchie and Rotberg are among 18 pairs of students and Holocaust survivors who have contributed to the Sustaining Memories Project, which was initiated by the Azrieli Foundation, an organization that helps survivors write their memoirs.

Margaret Kittel Canale and her mother, Vera Kittel have also taken part in this initiative to document Kittel's escape from Nazi persecution. Canale said her mother spoke very little about her experiences during the war, but her family was determined to record her story before this piece of their history was lost.

"My mother found it sad to talk about her family, with only her and her sister surviving. Whenever she hears people talk about all their relatives, she realizes how much she has lost. It has affected her all her life," said Canale, who helped write her mother's memoir.

"I would have done this program even if I couldn't have been paired with my mother, but I was grateful that they let me ask my mother if I could help her write her story. My mother said she might have held back some things if she had been talking to a stranger. In some ways, it was easier for me to work with her because I knew the characters and could help fill in some of the gaps."

Kittel was eight years old when Hitler came to power and began persecuting Jews – attacking synagogues, seizing Jewish businesses and arresting people.

In a supreme act of selflessness, one that she could only truly understand when she became a parent herself, her parents sent her to England on the Kindertransport, a rescue mission that sent nearly 10,000 Jewish children from Nazi Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland to live in British foster homes, hostels and farms.

Kittel said the decision her parents made to send her away was so painful, her mother couldn't come with her father to the train station to say goodbye.

Most of the rescued children survived the war, but the majority of their parents did not. Kittel's parents were killed in Auschwitz.

It was more than 50 years later that Canale first learned about the Kindertransport that saved her mother's life.

Today, she has an even better understanding of her mother's past and an appreciation for her resiliency.

"My mother said, 'We always looked forward, never back. We needed to find hope for the future.' It was hope that kept them moving forward, even when they came to Canada as immigrants and tried to get ahead."

On April 17 at 12:30 p.m. at Kensington Place Retirement Residence, the program's 18 survivors and their writing partners will celebrate the culmination of their work at a private luncheon with their families.

Each pair will be presented with a copy of the memoir they produced, the results of a project that is sure to have changed the lives of both the writing partners and the survivor authors forever.

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
A Great SCHOOL

It is with great sadness that Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto mourns the loss of our dear friend

Samuel Shainhouse ז"ל

Sam's lifelong relationship with Associated began as a student at the Brunswick Talmud Torah. After serving overseas in World War II, he returned to Canada, married his late wife Bea ז"ל and built both a family and a successful business. He resumed his association with the school as a parent enrolling each of his five children as students.

His election as President of Associated in 1971 culminated many years of devoted service as a volunteer and committee member. Sam deftly presided over an incredible decade of expansion and growth. His leadership, both literally and figuratively, laid the foundation for Associated's continued growth. Sam was also a champion in efforts to make Jewish day school financially accessible to the children of the community. After his presidency he continued to devote tremendous energy to Associated as a life member of the Board of Directors, Honorary Chair of the Board of Governors and Chair of the Scholarship and Endowment Committee.

In 2002, Sam was awarded Associated's Lifetime Achievement Award and was recognized for his vision, enthusiasm, dedication, modesty and great accomplishments.

Sam was a true believer in Jewish education. Along with his wife, Bea, he saw his five children graduate from Associated and later many of his grandchildren also attended or graduated from the school. The family followed in Sam's footsteps with a number of his children serving as committee or board members at Associated. Through their active commitment to Jewish education, the extended Shainhouse family is a living legacy to Sam's dedication to the Jewish future.

We extend our condolences to his children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren. May they bask in the blessings of Sam's memory and be spared from further sorrow.

Passover celebrations

Daniel Switzman of Temple Sinai Nursery School decorates his own seder plate designed from wood and bottle caps. Along with the seder plate, he also created a kiddush cup, matzah cover and Haggadah to use at his seders.

Members of the chesed committee at Bnei Akiva School's Yeshivat Or Chaim organized a chulent charity competition to raise funds for Od Yosef Chai's campaign to provide Pesach necessities for needy people in Israel. Six student teams prepared their own unique chulent recipes. Tasters paid a fee to sample the different chulents and a panel of judges ranked each one on flavour, appearance and other factors. Pictured are members of the winning team with their prized chulent, "Spice is Back" — from left, Baruch Margolis, Gideon Blinick, Ben Buckler, Ariel Shields and Shlomo Rand.

Shainhouse advocated for day school funding

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Samuel Shainhouse will be remembered as a leader in the Toronto Jewish community, a driving force in garnering community support for Jewish education, and a past president of several Jewish organizations – at times simultaneously. He died March 30 at Scarborough General Hospital following a 15-year struggle with Alzheimer's Disease. He was 91.

Born in Kovno, Lithuania, in 1921, Shainhouse was the youngest of four siblings. His family immigrated to Toronto in 1931, arriving in relative luxury on an ocean liner, his son, Zev, said in a eulogy.

The ship was the S.S. St. Louis, later known for its 1939 voyage with almost 1,000 ill-fated German Jewish refugee passengers. Shainhouse was known primarily for his involvement in Herut-Likud Canada – he was president of its predecessor, the Zionist Revisionist Organization – and was a member of the Betar youth group as a child in Lithuania. He called former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin his friend, Zev said.

Harry Wolle, a past president of Herut-Likud who knew Shainhouse for about 50 years, said that he had "two great passions," education for Jewish children, and his love of Israel and the Jewish people.

Samuel Shainhouse

"As a leader, he was strong-willed, he was charitable, and he didn't suffer fools gladly. He was very determined."

A successful businessman, Shainhouse began his working life after leaving Jarvis Collegiate at age 16 to help out his family during the Depression, when he delivered paper goods for his father's dry goods store.

In the late 1940s, after serving in the Royal Air Force in England and Burma, he and his brothers started their own business, National Knitting Mills. At the time, the Canadian government was offering released soldiers a piece of land or $750 cash, Zev said. His father opted for the cash, and used it to invest in the business.

Shainhouse was one of the first presidents of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto after it separated from Associated Hebrew Schools, and he served as president of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) Toronto for 19 years, starting in 1967. Kurt Weinberg, former executive director of JNF Toronto and its Ontario region, said that with Shainhouse's passing, "another stalwart of the past is gone."

Weinberg remembers him as a go-getter, a practical man, an innovator and "a Zionist above everything."

"Under his leadership we managed to completely start the transformation of JNF. In those days we raised very little money… JNF now is a powerful instrument."

Zev remembers his father for his ability to "bring people from different parts of the community together," he told The CJN.

He also credited him for his role in bringing day school funding into the Jewish community charitable organization (now UJA Federation of Greater Toronto) in the 1960s.

"Day school was a hard sell [at the time]," Zev said. "And I think everybody in today's community would agree that Jewish education is the most secure route we have to a Jewish future."

Rabbi Mark Smiley, director of education of Associated Hebrew Schools, called Shainhouse "a visionary." Along with other community leaders, Shainhouse advocated for federation support for day school tuition.

Shainhouse was predeceased by his siblings Rose Silverstein, Oscar and Louis Shainhouse, and by his wife Beatrice. He leaves his children Zev, Chaim, David, Batsheva and Jonathan; 15 grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren.

Defeated Tory candidate leaves gov't advisory job

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — After weeks of controversy, defeated Mount Royal Tory candidate Saulie Zajdel suddenly left his job as a regional adviser for the Conservative government last week.

Saulie Zajdel

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler had accused Zajdel of acting as his "shadow MP" and working to undermine him while on the public payroll.

Zajdel was appointed in September as a regional adviser for community outreach and relations. He worked under Industry Minister Christian Paradis, the minister responsible for the Montreal region, and Canadian Heritage Minister James Moore.

He described the job at the time as connecting principally with the anglophone and ethnic communities and municipalities to see if they can benefit from various federal programs.

Zajdel was present in November when Paradis announced an unprecedented grant of more than $763,000 to kashrut certification agencies in Canada to enhance food safety for a program administered by Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir.

"I was tired of being this distraction" and quit for the good of the Conservative party, Zajdel told a Montreal radio station April 4. He also said he felt insulted by being called a shadow MP.

Zajdel, who served on Montreal city council and its executive committee for 25 years, vigorously contested the Mount Royal seat and came within 2,200 votes of beating Cotler in what has long been a safe Liberal riding.

Israel became a central issue in Zajdel's campaign among Jewish voters, and Cotler objected to being targeted as part of the Conservatives' portrayal of the Liberals as less sympathetic to the Jewish state than the Tories.

After the May election, Zajdel said he would be running again in the riding. He said last week that he would still like to be the Conservative candidate in Mount Royal, if the party wants him.

Last month, Moore defended Zajdel's hiring, saying his duties were "not political at all. There's no political involvement. It's entirely a ministerial staff function."

In addition to serving as a liaison to cultural communities, Zajdel's municipal experience made him well suited to helping organize Ottawa's participation in Montreal's 375th anniversary celebrations in 2017, Moore said.

Que. MNA to run for 6th term

Holocaust monument could receive $4M

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Work on Canada's National Holocaust Monument can now proceed apace with the news last week that Ottawa will provide up to $4 million in funding to build the memorial.

Four of the five voluntary members of the monument's development council were also named last week. The council is charged with fundraising and maintenance for the monument, as well as helping to choose the site where it will be built.

Tim Uppal

Its members are Rabbi Daniel Friedman of Edmonton's Beth Israel Synagogue; Ralf Lean, a Toronto lawyer with Cassels Brock and Blackwell LLP; Alvin Segal, chairman and CEO of Peerless Clothing in Montreal, and Fran Sonshine, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

A fifth council member from British Columbia will be announced soon, Sonshine said.

Rabbi Friedman, the council's chair, told The CJN it's "high time" a tribute of this nature is constructed in Canada.

"This is an important step Canada has taken to recognize survivors in the Jewish community and for all Canadians," he said. "We're the only Allied nation without a Holocaust monument in the capital region. The government recognizes this is something important to all Canadians."

The rabbi also praised Edmonton-Sherwood Park MP Tim Uppal, whose private member's bill to create the monument passed last year.

Uppal, a Sikh, has very close ties to the Jewish community. His wife, Kiran, even went on a March of the Living trip when she was a teenager, Rabbi Friedman said.

"My fellow council members and I are looking forward to moving this project along as quickly as possible," he said.

Asked if the $4 million from the government might on its own be enough to finance the monument without additional fundraising activities, Rabbi Friedman said similar memorials around the world all cost that much, if not more.

He added that the government's contribution was "extremely generous, but nonetheless appropriate."

"This monument will be world-class and something that is an indelible mark on the Canadian nation for generations to come," he said.

Rabbi Friedman said it was fortunate that the federal funding, pledged by Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, was available.

"It warmed our hearts that minister Baird has found it in the budget to provide these funds," he said.

When Uppal announced the formation of the council last week, there was no mention of funding for the monument and his private member's bill was vague on that detail.

But Baird's press secretary, Joseph Lavoie, told The CJN that the government "will match funds raised, up to a maximum of $4 million dollars, by the campaign."

Sonshine said the National Capital Commission (NCC) has selected a few possible sites for the monument, and she and other council members have toured the sites and will decide on the one they think is best.

The monument's design will be determined through a competition "launched on behalf of the minister of foreign affairs and the development council under the auspices of the NCC," she said.

In an April 2 statement, Uppal said Canada has long fought against antisemitism and racism.

"We must never forget what happens when humanity and fundamental human rights are discarded, as this is the only way to ensure it will never happen again."

Parades banned in Outremont

JTA

MONTREAL — City officials in Outremont have banned all street parades and processions in response to escalating tensions with the chassidic community.

The episode is the newest dispute between the expanding chassidic community and its neighbours in the Montreal borough. Outremont Mayor Marie Cinq-Mars and a majority of council members voted on April 2 to ban parades and processions, in the wake of a noisy confrontation last month at Purim between borough Counc. Céline Forget, who is known for her dogged surveillance of the chassidic community, and members of that community.

The clash, which was taped and posted on YouTube, degenerated into shouting, name-calling and police intervention.

In response, Outremont decided that it wouldn't allow a chassidic sect to hold a street procession later this month to mark the visit of a rabbi from New York.

Feminist MK talks hasbarah with Halifax Jews

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — In eight hours in Halifax, MK Einat Wilf made quite an impression.

A dynamic speaker, oozing with confidence and intelligence and freely offering well-considered opinions, Wilf met with close to 50 Jewish community members and separately with local politicians and the media, each time stressing the importance of women in political life and decision-making, and touching on foreign policy and education.

MK Einat Wilf

Wilf's first stop on a whirlwind Canadian trip was Halifax, followed by engagements in Montreal, Quebec City and Ottawa. She arrived April 2 and returned to Israel April 5 in time for Pesach with her family. She was invited by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and was hosted in Halifax by the Atlantic Jewish Council.

Elected to the Knesset 18 months ago, Wilf noted that there are 24 women in Israel's parliament – representing 20 per cent of the Knesset's 120 members – which exceeds the proportions in similar bodies in the United States, Britain, and France, and is close to Canada's 25 per cent ratio.

"It's no longer unique in Israel to have women in stronger positions, although the business sector still lags behind in female leadership… but it's improving," she said.

Wilf said she's a feminist, but added she didn't realize she had those leanings until attending university and then working in the United States after her mostly Israeli upbringing.

"My home was egalitarian [both her parents were teachers], and I was allowed to let my ambitions take me as far as I wanted. I served four years in the army, in intelligence, where brains were more important than brawn and had more equality [as a woman] than in many other units."

But when she studied at Harvard University and then worked in New York, "I sensed the cusp of women moving forward very quickly. When I came back to Israel in 1998, I didn't feel the same. I considered us more 20th century rather than moving into the 21st century."

Now, 14 years later, she said Israel has caught up and is doing well. "It's a good time to be a woman in Israel," she said. "I think we're in the 21st century in seeing women's role in leadership grow, but still in the 20th as far as equal pay, ability to balance home and career, and sexual harassment. Yet strides are being made.

"Of course, we're still in the 10th century when you look at the way women are treated in the Arab minority and the ultra-Orthodox minority, both of whom see themselves threatened by the majority culture. That's certainly a challenge for feminists."

Women's issues, education and foreign policy have been main interests for Wilf, who said that as a teenager, she dreamed of being Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

"I haven't given up that dream yet," she smiled. "But to do what I wanted to do, I had to get into politics."

She joined the Labour party and moved up the party list, and by February 2009, she was 14th. Labour won 13 seats in elections that year, so "I was the lady-in-waiting. I watched the swearing in from home but, when a member resigned soon afterward, I was moved into a seat."

Now, as a member of the recently formed Independent Party headed by Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Wilf is one of five party members in the Knesset, of whom two are female. She fights for women's rights and better educational opportunities. In May, she will become chair of the Knesset's education committee.

"I think I've had some influence in education, which is now the second largest budget item, after defence. Yet I think we have a long way to go in building a good education system."

Her efforts in foreign policy focus on building present and future alliances, as she did on her Canadian trip, and helping build a positive image of Israel in the world.

"I'm not the official spokesperson for the government, but in Israel, I'm among the top three who are not men who engage in foreign affairs for the government," she said. "I'm able to articulate the classical Zionist position, which, sadly, needs that articulation. I believe in partition. Jews and Arabs both have claims to the land, but while Jews have acknowledged it, the Arabs have never been willing to accept that Jews have claims [as well]. The fundamentals are attacked, distorted and lied about.

"This is a war fought with words," she continued. "In op-ed pieces, and by academics and in supermarkets, not with guns and tanks. We need to fight this war and win it – and I think we can. We can't just be nice and think the truth will come out. We have to fight back and meet the lies head-on."

Israeli access to Azeri airfields makes no sense

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The amount of media speculation over the past few months about whether Israel will attack Iran's nuclear installations has been overwhelming.

With reports and commentary quoting this or that "expert" or "anonymous source," speculation by definition can make no pretense to knowledge. Unsuspecting consumers of the media might be forgiven for assuming otherwise, and believing that they're privy to some factual nugget that offers genuine behind-the-scenes insight.

Such was the case late last month when Foreign Policy magazine published Mark Perry's article, "Israel's Secret Staging Ground." Perry alleges that four (unnamed) "senior diplomats and military intelligence officers say that the United States has concluded that Israel has recently been granted access to airbases on Iran's northern border" in Azerbaijan. The reason could only be to allow Israel convenient proximity to carry out bombing operations on Iran – something, Perry argues, the Obama administration desperately wants to prevent. And what better way to accomplish this than by leaking such explosive material to Perry, whose allegations were picked up by a limited number of western media outlets.

Within a few days, however, veteran Arab affairs reporter Ehud Ya'ari was all over Perry, writing in a post on the Times of Israel website that the allegation "simply does not make any sense." Ya'ari also criticized the Israeli media for having reported seriously on a rumour that had no merit, and he accused the editors of Foreign Policy of demonstrating "negligent naiveté" for having published it in the first place.

Ya'ari's argument is two-fold. First, he notes that Perry is a prominent "anti-Israel warrior" with a history of planting "cloak-and-dagger patchwork stories aimed at undermining a state he intensely detests."

Second, even though Israel and Azerbaijan have close relations, a minimal understanding of Azerbaijan's internal politics and relationship with Iran quickly reveals that it would be unimaginable for the Azeri government to expose its airfields to Iranian retaliation following a potential Israeli strike.

In this respect, Ya'ari asked: "How can Azerbaijan possibly afford to co-operate in an attack on Iran when it depends on Iran entirely for maintaining control over that significant part of this country, the Nakhichevan region, an exclave and autonomous republic of Azerbaijan that is totally separated from the main Azeri territory by its arch-enemy, Armenia?"

Even on such a basic issue of how Israel could hope to get its planes to Azerbaijan in the first place, Ya'ari pointed out, sardonically, that a glance at an atlas reveals another major flaw in Perry's argument. Ya'ari charges: "Are the Israelis going to get a permit from Mr. Erdogan to fly over Turkey on their way to hit Iran?... Or, alternatively, does Perry want us to believe that the Israelis will choose to bypass Turkey on their secret mission via the longer route over Greece and Bulgaria, thus becoming fully exposed to Russian radar in the Black Sea? Take a look at the map, Mr. Perry — there is no other way for the Israelis to get to Azerbaijan!"

Ehud Ya'ari

To his credit, while mentioning the surface plausibility about the tactical advantages that Israel would gain from access to Azerbaijan's airfields, the Globe and Mail's Paul Koring (on April 3) also raised skeptical questions about Perry's piece. He wondered whether the Obama administration, despite a predictable official denial, may have leaked statements, conveyed by Perry, as part of a disinformation campaign to constrain Israel. Koring also cited Ya'ari's incisive critique from the Times of Israel.

Which brings us back to Ya'ari's core point. Serious debate about how to deal with Iran's nuclear program, he claims, "requires down-to-earth discussion based on facts and then a grain of common sense." Where both ingredients are missing, we end up only with speculative nonsense passing for substance. Indeed, when it comes to the issue of Iran, observers would be wise to heed Ya'ari's sage advice.

Appreciation of his heritage rooted in upbringing

Rabbi Yosef is certainly a fitting spectator of this room's activity. Not only does Azoulay maintain a close relationship with him, but, in Azoulay's words, "We share the same goals, same mentality, same agenda." Azoulay identifies Rabbi Yosef as his most influential motivator in his decision to record the legacy of Sephardi heritage.

Azoulay discovered the need for English biographies of Sephardi rabbis during a year of post-high school study in Israel. An extensive search through bookstores, libraries, archives and even online sources yielded a single publication: a book about Baba Sali, the illustrious 20th-century Moroccan spiritual leader. Back home in North America, his continued search also yielded nothing.

Sweeping his hands across his bookshelves, Azoulay emphasizes the enormous imbalance between the number of English-language biographies of Ashkenazi rabbis and those of Sephardi rabbis. It was clear to him that a parallel Sephardi library was needed.

But it was a cavalier comment to Azoulay by a student at a kollel where he was studying that the number of Torah-great Sephardi rabbis throughout history could be counted on one hand that impelled him to start writing.

He was 19 years old.

Azoulay's first book, A Legacy of Leaders, was published in 2008, and a second volume, A Legacy of Leaders II, the following year. Nearly 5,000 copies of the first have been printed thus far, not including translations in French, Spanish and, expected later this year, Persian.

Designed to appeal to all readers, the books contain brief biographical chapters and vignettes of better-known Sephardi rabbis, intentionally including those that Ashkenazim might recognize, too. However, Azoulay's third book, Ben Ish Hai, is a 400-plus-page tome devoted to a single rabbi, Rabbi Yosef Haim.

The books have garnered incredible feedback. People have contacted Azoulay not just to laud his work and appeal for more publications, but many have reached out to him as an ambassador of Sephardi heritage.

Azoulay has also found that his audience extended well beyond the Sephardi community, which was actually his objective.

"That's the goal: to educate everyone," he says. "These rabbis belong to us all."

Azoulay's appreciation of his Sephardi heritage is rooted in his upbringing. Although he was born in Toronto, his parents are both Moroccan. Originally non-observant, the family became Orthodox during his childhood, but always rigorously upheld their Sephardi traditions.

Azoulay's Sephardi identity was intensified by the anecdotes about great rabbis and historical events imparted in shul, at community gatherings and around the Shabbat table. He credits his parents' influence and reinforcement of Sephardi heritage, as well as the personal guidance of Rabbi Amram Assayag, Toronto's prominent Sephardi leader, for his decision to undertake this venture.

Azoulay continues his family's traditions in his own home, which he shares with his wife, Rena, and two young daughters. But he worries about the influences of both secular society and the predominantly Ashkenazi Jewish community on his own children, specifically, and on Sephardi youth in general.

He wants Sephardim to embrace their beautiful heritage and be proud of it, but he believes that to do so, they must know something about it.

Azoulay wants to inspire and educate, and there's no doubt that while he's already achieving this through his publications and as a teacher of Jewish philosophy to high school students, his ambition and passion are propelling him further.

He plans to pursue a PhD in Sephardi or general Jewish history at Yeshiva University's Bernard Revel Graduate School after simultaneously completing his BA in history through Excelsior College in Albany, N.Y., and his MA at YU's Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education (which accepted Azoulay on the merit of his published work, despite his not having yet completed his BA).

He has somehow managed to find time to create SephardicLegacy.com, a website focused on Sephardi Torah literature, and to volunteer with numerous Sephardi organizations. Ultimately, Azoulay sees himself professionally involved in the Sephardi community and is already entertaining related job offers.

But that's only part of his immediate to-do list, which includes building a high-school Jewish history curriculum, producing documentaries, creating an expansive online hub for Sephardi Jews, helping to develop an international Sephardi organization and even dabbling in Israeli politics, because Azoulay, a self-professed history buff, sees that as the only way to change the future.

Among other political causes, Azoulay hopes for a socio-economic transformation for Sephardim in Israel, where he says they're often considered second-class citizens.

And he's already at work on his next book, about the Chida, Rabbi Haim Yosef David Azoulay (an indirect relative), which is due out in April 2013.

Azoulay's zeal is clearly what fuels him: he enthusiastically recounts his recent experience discovering the archived documents regarding the Chida's 1960 Jerusalem reburial. Until Azoulay stumbled across the collection, no one had looked at it since 1961. "Can you imagine," he enthuses, "that nobody opened it in 50 years?"

In all, Azoulay plans to write about 15 books, one of which will be about Rabbi Ovadia Yosef. This will likely be his tour de force, not just because of the greatness of Rabbi Yosef, but because of Azoulay's own relationship with him. Recently, the rabbi even offered Azoulay the rights to translate into English all 53 of his volumes on Halachah. Azoulay declined, because it would remove him from his own work.

In his goal to educate and motivate others, he says that researching and writing about these rabbinic personalities have inspired him, too, reinforcing his own connection to God, Sephardi leaders and the community. And through his work, he has greatly expanded his network within the Sephardi world, assisting him in his ongoing research and placing him at the vanguard of Sephardi society and leadership today.

Minister orders extradition in Paris shul bombing

JTA

OTTAWA—An Ottawa professor has been ordered extradited to France, where he faces charges related to the 1980 bombing of a synagogue in Paris that killed four people.

Justice Minister Rob Nicholson issued the extradition order last week against Hassan Diab, who formerly taught sociology at two Ottawa universities.

The RCMP arrested Diab in November 2008 in response to a request by France. An Ontario court ruled to extradite him last year.

His lawyer, Donald Bayne, called the decision to extradite his client a denial of basic legal and human rights. He said they would take the case to the Federal Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada, if necessary.

Justice Minister Rob Nicholson

The terrorist bombing in central Paris killed four passersby, and many others inside and outside the synagogue were injured.

The Lebanese-born Diab, a Canadian citizen, has denied any role in the attack, claiming he is the victim of mistaken identity.

"We expected this decision but not this way," Diab told the Ottawa Citizen. "We expected the minister to address our points, which he did not. He just ignored them and rendered his decision based on his political beliefs more than anything else."

Diab's lawyer says a key plank in the appeal will be a written admission from Paris that authorities have not yet finished investigating the synagogue bombing. He said a Canadian citizen can only be extradited if he or she is wanted for trial, not "for the purpose of continuing an investigation to determine whether or not there will ever be a trial."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said "Canada's co-operation [with France] is appropriate and reasonable given the evidence sent by France, which met the criteria for extradition between here and France.

"Treaties like this are between governments. It's not a partisan that has put forward the request for extradition. It's a sovereign state."

"We're supportive of the judicial process that's underway. The government clearly had enough evidence to move forward with the extradition process," he added.

Diab's lawyer saw it differently. "This is a disappointing decision that politically I'm sure the minister found difficult to make in favour of Dr. Diab," Bayne told the Citizen. "It would have taken a great deal of political courage for him to do the right thing."

U.S. deploys second carrier ahead of Iran talks

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The U.S. Navy has deployed a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf amid rising tensions with Iran over its nuclear program, Cmdr. Amy Derrick-Frost of the Bahrain-based 5th Fleet said Monday.

Derrick-Frost said that the deployment of the nuclear-powered USS Enterprise along the Abraham Lincoln carrier strike group marks only the fourth time in the past decade that the navy has had two aircraft carriers operating at the same time in the region.

Derrick-Frost says the two carriers will support the American military operations in Afghanistan and anti-piracy efforts off Somalia's coast and in the Gulf of Aden.

The battleships will also patrol the Gulf's strategic oil routes that Iran has threatened to shut down in retaliation for economic sanctions.

In late January, the carrier USS Abraham Lincoln completed a "regular and routine," accompanied by strike group of warships. That's the first U.S. aircraft carrier to enter the Gulf since late December and was on a routine rotation to replace the outgoing USS John C. Stennis.

The deployment announced on Monday came less than a week before six world powers were set to open negotiations in Istanbul with the Islamic Republic over its contentious nuclear program.

Iranian Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Salehi said Iran would not agree to world powers imposing pre-conditions ahead of the resumption of talks, Iranian media reported on Monday.

"Setting conditions before the meeting means drawing conclusions, which is completely meaningless and none of the parties will accept conditions set before the talks," the Iranian parliamentary news agency quoted him as saying.

But Iran's nuclear chief, Fereidoun Abbasi, has hinted that the Islamic Republic may offer a compromise.

At the core of the dispute is the issue of uranium enrichment. The West fears Tehran is seeking an atomic weapon, which the country denies. Uranium has to be enriched to more than 90 per cent to be used for a nuclear weapon.

Abbasi told state TV late Sunday that Tehran could stop its production of 20 per cent enriched uranium needed for a research reactor and continue enriching uranium to lower levels for power generation.

This could take place once Iran has stock piled enough of the 20 per cent enriched uranium, Abbasi said.

Meanwhile, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak seem at odds over the severity of the demands that the six western powers – the United States, Britain, France, Russia, China and Germany – should present to Iran in negotiations over its nuclear program.

Netanyahu supports a demand to completely halt all uranium enrichment and remove all enriched material from Iran, while Barak is in favour of allowing the Iranians to continue enriching uranium to a low level and for several hundred kilograms of enriched uranium to remain in Iran.

In two separate statements made on Sunday, Netanyahu and Barak presented what they described as "Israel's position" on dialogue between Iran and the six superpowers. However, the statements contained several contradictions on core issues.

In contradiction to Netanyahu's statement, a statement released by Barak called for demanding that the Iranians remove all enriched uranium from the state, "aside from a quantity of several hundred kilograms, which would not allow for the continued enrichment for weapons or a nuclear facility."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

Barak presented two additional demands, beyond those presented by Netanyahu, including International Atomic Energy Agency supervision over all Iranian nuclear activity and full disclosure of the history and the activity in important areas that belong to its military nuclear project. Barak also noted that, in exchange, the Iranians could receive fuel rods for the nuclear facility in Tehran.

Netanyahu said in a meeting on Sunday with Italian Prime Minister Mario Monti that the superpowers must demand a complete end to all uranium enrichment by Iran.

Netanyahu also voiced skepticism over the upcoming talks with Iran. In the meeting with Monti in his Caesarea home, Netanyahu said that Israel will follow the talks closely "since Iran is using them to delay and deceive."

Israel, which has threatened last-resort attacks on its arch foe's nuclear facilities if diplomacy fails, demanded last month that any negotiated resolution should end all uranium enrichment, high and low level, and remove all fuel already stockpiled by Iran.

But western diplomats have said the six superpowers would first tackle its uranium refinement to a fissile concentration of 20 per cent rather than its more abundant 3.5 per cent pure fuel.

The 20 per cent enriched uranium would be far easier to enrich to bomb-grade 90 per cent purity, though Iran denies having such designs, saying it is only seeking electrical energy and medical isotopes.

"We told our American friends, as well as the Europeans, that we would have expected the threshold for successful negotiations to be clear, namely that the P5+1 will demand clearly that – no more enrichment to 20 per cent," Barak said in an interview with CNN on Sunday.

Iran says it has a sovereign right to peaceful nuclear technology and has repeatedly rejected UN resolutions calling for a suspension of all uranium enrichment. But it has at times appeared more flexible regarding 20 per cent enrichment, which it began in early 2010, and some experts say that initially getting Iran to stop this higher-grade work could open a way to ease the deadlock.

Western diplomats have stressed that an initial focus on 20 percent enrichment should not be seen as "legitimizing" lower-level work as the UN Security Council has demanded a full suspension.

Iran has enough 3.5 and 20 per cent-enriched uranium for around four bombs if refined further, western experts say.

According to a report in the New York Times on Saturday, the world powers, which have ramped up sanctions against Iran, also plan to press it to close and dismantle a recently completed enrichment bunker in a mountain near Qom – another demand levelled by the Israelis.

Journalist Mike Wallace dies

JTA

NEW YORK — Veteran journalist Mike Wallace, who appeared on the CBS news program 60 Minutes from its first airing, has died.

Wallace died Saturday at the age of 93, CBS Face the Nation host Bob Schieffer announced Sunday morning on the program. He died at a care facility in New Haven, Conn., where he had been living in recent years.

Wallace, who was accused by the watchdog group CAMERA of having an Israel problem, retired from 60 Minutes in 2006 after 38 seasons on the news program, but continued to contribute to the program and other CBS news shows.

Mike Wallace

During the course of his career, Wallace interviewed Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. During a 1989 interview with Arafat, Wallace allowed him to spout his anti-Israel views without questioning them. When he asked Arafat if he had renounced "military operations" inside Israel, Arafat responded, "Any people who are facing occupation or oppression have the right to use all methods." Wallace did not probe this with a followup question, CAMERA pointed out in a 2006 report called "Mike Wallace's Middle East Problem."

He interviewed Abba Eban, Israel's ambassador to the United States, in 1958.

He was awarded 21 Emmy awards, five DuPont-Columbia journalism awards and five Peabody awards during his career.

Born Myron Leon Wallace in Brookline, Mass., to Russian Jewish parents Frank and Zina Wallace, who had shortened their family name from Wallechinsky, he graduated from the University of Michigan, where he worked for the Michigan Daily student newspaper and was a member of the Zeta Beta Tau fraternity. Wallace hosted several game shows in the 1950s.

His son, Chris Wallace, is the host of Fox News Sunday for the Fox News network.

Ethiopian rabbi leads Israeli shul with Ashkenazi congregation

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

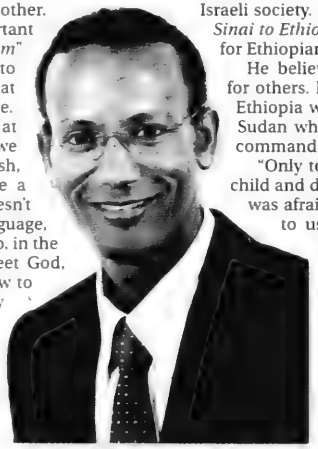
Rabbi Sharon Shalom can drop a Yiddish expression with the best of them. "A sach gesundt" (lots of health) he says as he ends a conversation.

As spiritual leader of a congregation consisting largely of Holocaust survivors and their families, it's no surprise he's able to speak "a bissel Yiddish" (a little Yiddish). He's even heard the term "shvartze" a few times, when people discuss his role as rabbi of Kdoshei Yisrael Synagogue in Kiryat Gat.

As an immigrant to Israel from Ethiopia, he understands the skepticism that greeted his role as rabbi of an Ashkenazi congregation. "People ask," he said with a phrasing that might be part Ethiopian, part Yiddish.

His answer, however, is entirely rabbinic. Nearly 2,000 years ago, during the Jewish revolt against Rome, the Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed. At the time, he explained, "all the people were the same colour, [spoke] the same language, [enjoyed] the same culture. But the people hated each other. Each thought they were more important than the other." It was "sinat chinam" (baseless hatred), he said, referring to the rabbinic explanation for the defeat and exile that befell the Jewish people.

When he reflects on his position at Kdoshei Yisrael, " I tell them, when we came to be a people, like in Yiddish, menshlichkeit [is important]; to be a human being, a person, adam. It doesn't matter if you speak a different language, have a different culture or colour…so, in the synagogue, before you come to meet God, one of the conditions is to know how to meet persons. It doesn't matter if they are secular, Ashkenazi, Sephardi, Moroccan. If you give them respect, they can meet and speak to God."



Rabbi Sharon Shalom

Rabbi Shalom will be in Toronto this week as guest speaker at Congregation Darchei Noam. He will discuss "An Ethiopian Contribution to Jewish Life in Israel and Abroad" on April 15 at 7:30 p.m.

Rabbi Shalom, 39, hails from Zaoda Tapsai, a small village in northern Ethiopia that was entirely Jewish, he said in a telephone interview from Israel.

He studied Torah at an early age as well as other holy books recognized by Ethiopian Jews but considered Apocrypha by rabbinic Judaism.

The Jewish Bible consists of 24 books; the Ethiopians revered 68, he said.

The Talmud, the collection of rabbinic discussions on Jewish law and customs, was not part of Ethiopian Jewish literature. "All the traditions they take straight from the Bible," he said.

When Ethiopian Jewry moved to Israel in two great aliyot, they were faced with more than culture shock. The religious traditions they had practised, from schchitah to taharah (ritual purity) were practiced differently in Israel.

"This is a big conflict and we find today a big confusion with this problem in Eretz Yisrael (the land of Israel)," he said. "Some want to stay exactly like in Ethiopia. Others say, 'we are here and we must accept the commandments as in Israel, the Talmud, the Shulchan Aruch (a code of Jewish law), everything.'" Complicating the issue is that "a high percentage of the second generation has no connection with the Talmud or Ethiopian tradition. They're actually secular.

"This is a big crisis," Rabbi Shalom stated. "There are a lot reasons for that phenomenon. When Ethiopian Jews came here and the rabbis told them they may not be Jewish and need to convert, this request made them very, very angry."

Ethiopian spiritual leaders were also upset by laws that prevented them from doing what they had done in Africa, such as officiating at weddings or performing schchitah.

"Ethiopian Jews are still looking for their way," Rabbi Shalom said. "They're struggling with their identity. They feel sometimes more black, more Jewish, more Ethiopian, more Israeli…. It's still being resolved."

Some Ethiopian Jews have travelled back to Ethiopia in search of their roots. "Most of them came back and [say] Ethiopia is not for me. They became more Zionist and more proud of their identity."

Rabbi Shalom is trying to bridge the divide that makes it difficult for many Ethiopians to integrate into Israeli society. He recently published a book, From Sinai to Ethiopia, which is "like a Shulchan Aruch for Ethiopians," he said.

He believes his own story can be a model for others. In the early 1980s, as a child fleeing Ethiopia without his parents, he was in south Sudan when he saw his first Israeli – a naval commando.

"Only today can I understand. I was a little child and didn't understand then. I remember I was afraid and in big shock when they came to us, and they embraced us and they kissed me. I felt more comfortable and more relaxed."

Rabbi Shalom was part of Operation Moses in which 8,000 Ethiopian Jews were secretly airlifted to Israel.

A second airlift, Operation Solomon, brought a further 14,000 Ethiopians to Israel in 1991.

Even on the telephone, Rabbi Shalom's excitement at being in Israel is palpable. He is clearly impressed with the accomplishments of Israel in only 64 years of existence.

"The Jewish people come from all the world. It's amazing. When I walk the street in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Kiryat Gat, it's unbelievable how the state, with all its struggles, built beautiful houses, and succeeds. It's an amazing country and makes me proud to be part of the Jewish people."

He recognizes, however, that Israeli society is not free of racism. Ninety per cent of Ethiopians share that belief, he said.

"I believe that Israel is like the world. What's a danger in the world is to be alive. It's very dangerous. If you believe that and ask God why do You make life so hard, you can scream all day and not find answers.

"[When] you wake up [you should] say, the world has nothing personal against you, this is the world and I have to find a way to struggle with what is going on in the world.

"I must be strong. If I look for an answer for success, I won't find it in Israeli society. The answer is very deep inside me. So, I say Shalom, you must take responsibility and be proud and be strong. I'm sure with this way, Ethiopians can be integrated into the world."

Arabs boycott Adidas

An Arab boycott has been launched against sports apparel manufacturer Adidas over its sponsorship of last month's Jerusalem marathon. The boycott was announced last week in Jedda, Saudi Arabia, after a meeting of the Arab youth and sports council of ministers, AFP reported. "All companies that have sponsored the marathon of Jerusalem, including Adidas, will be boycotted," Saudi Prince Nawaf bin Faisal, chairman of the council, said. The route of this year's marathon took runners through parts of eastern Jerusalem. Faisal also announced that next year, marathons would take place in several Arab countries under the banner "Jerusalem is Ours."

Rocket strikes Eilat

A long-range Grad rocket fired from the Sinai Peninsula in Egypt exploded near a residential area of Eilat last week. No injuries were reported. The rocket landed in a construction site, according to reports. Three explosions were heard in the city, but the other two rockets have not been located, the reports indicate. The attack came a day before the start of Passover, when hundreds of tourists from Israel and abroad flock to the Red Sea resort town. Egypt's security chief denied that the attack had originated in Sinai, according to the French news agency AFP. In August 2011, eight Israelis were killed in a terrorist attack on a bus and cars travelling near Eilat. Israel claimed the Palestinian attackers entered Israel through the border with Sinai. The previous year, several long-range rockets were fired at Eilat from the Sinai. Israel is currently constructing a 16-foot-tall border fence from Eilat to Gaza, to keep out terrorists and migrants.

Helping the needy

Israeli Social Affairs Minister Moshe Kahlon said his ministry will provide needy Israelis with a magnetic card to purchase food at local stores instead of handing out food packages. The ministry will distribute the cards to 32,000 needy families with funding assistance from the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews. Kahlon's announcement came a day after he criticized non-profit organizations for humiliating the needy by publicly handing out food packages. "I oppose photographing the needy when they come to collect a basket of food. The Social Affairs Ministry is promoting magnetic cards as a means of distributing food aid," Kahlon said.

Hebron house evacuated

A group of Jews were evicted from a home near the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron without incident. Israeli security forces last Wednesday evacuated the Jewish families from the home they had entered a week ago. The evacuation took only a few moments and was carried out on the orders of Defence Minister Ehud Barak. "I will continue to act in order to maintain the rule of law and democracy while guaranteeing the authority of the state over its citizens," Barak said in a statement following the evacuation.

Thornhill restaurant to feature a taste of Aleppo

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When Yogibar Frozen Dessert officially opens its doors for the first time on April 29, there will be a touch of the old world on the menu.

Customers may not notice it among the exotic new world flavours for frozen yogurt, such as cotton candy, but the recipe for the basic plain yogurt comes to Thornhill all the way from Aleppo, Syria. That's the hometown of the Esses family, who operate Yogibar along with five other kosher restaurants and cafes.

"This goes back to the original yogurt recipe," he said.

Back in the day, Shlomo Esses recounted, his grandfather, also named Shlomo, produced dairy products in Aleppo and shipped much of it to the Jewish community in Beirut.

Chances are the Jews in Beirut didn't enjoy 15 different flavours of frozen yogurt. They likely also didn't have the selection of kosher eateries to choose from, as they do in Toronto. Five of them (soon to be six) belong to one family, who have been in the kosher food business since 1984. It's a tradition that dates back to the 1940s and 1950s, when Shlomo Esses, the grandfather, provided milk, cheeses and other dairy products, said Shlomo, the grandson.

In 1948, the family moved to Beirut and continued the business. In 1977, after a stay in Israel, Shlomo's father, Albert, made the move to Toronto. His first business was Dairy Treats, a restaurant on Bathurst that's still going strong. Since then, they have added Café Sheli, Oasis Café, Miami Grill and Bistro Grande. Yogibar makes six.

Like the other kosher restaurants in Toronto, this is a family business that requires lots of hands-on attention, Shlomo said. "It's either me or my father" putting in the long hours, Shlomo said.

All the restaurants' baked goods are produced in-house. Baking starts at 10 p.m. and goes to 7 a.m. The catering side of the business kicks off at 6 a.m.

"My father is there real early," Shlomo said.

Altogether, it's a 24-hour operation that would tax the stamina of any businessman.

"It's a hard business to begin with," even before taking into account all the steps that need to be taken to ensure the restaurants retain their kosher certification, Esses said.

And like any restaurant business, there are challenges. So far, unlike many other kosher restaurants that have come and gone, the Esses family's eateries remain going concerns.

With the economic slowdown of the last few years, people are changing their eating habits, Esses said. They're still eating out, but spending less.

People are more health conscious than in previous eras, so the menu has to reflect that by offering more salads and low fat options, he said.

At the Oasis Café downtown, located in the Exchange Tower, customers favour salads accompanied by low-fat dressings on the side. They even offer low-fat breads, he said.

Still, another trend is sure to please kosher restaurateurs. Esses said he's noticed "more people are eating kosher. The community has grown a lot, and a lot of people are going back to their roots."

Sort of like the Esses family from Aleppo.

Netanyahu assesses Israel's economic situation

Moti Bassok and Sami Peretz
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The State of Israel is doing "not badly" compared with other countries, and "if you deduct the Arabs and ultra-Orthodox from inequality indexes, we're in great shape," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a special interview for the Passover holiday

Equal opportunity is key, in the prime minister's view. "Populism is dangerous. It contravenes the complex truth of managing a free economy," Netanyahu said. "The right combination is between a free economy and social policy that addresses the needs of society and creates equal opportunity. The State of Israel can be proud of what we're doing."

But he qualified his remarks, saying that if the haredi and Arab communities are set aside from the calculation of inequality, "we're in great shape."

The latest annual report on Israel from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) praised the state of the Israeli economy. But it also claimed that inequality has become much greater in Israel during the last 20 years, making Israel one of the three IMF members with the worst inequality problem. If Israel doesn't take steps to integrate the Arab and haredi communities into the workforce, the IMF warned, economic growth will suffer.

In December 2011, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development also chimed in, saying Israel was among the four member countries with the widest gap between rich and poor. Israel is in good company – the other three were the United States, Mexico and the United Kingdom.

According to the prime minister, the gap originates with the haredi and Arab communities, where birth rates are high and participation in the workforce is low. In other words, families tend to be bigger and breadwinners scarcer, making poverty a problem.

These two communities are part of a problem that led the middle class to take to the streets last summer, protesting the high cost of living, because the middle class feels it's financing them, Netanyahu said.

He heard the public protests, Netanyahu said, and isolated three main accusations – the high costs of housing, of caring for young children, and of goods and services.

"About housing, I took action well before the protest began…" he said. "The second thing was to increase the building of new homes, from 30,000 to 45,000 a year. Third… was the reform of the Israel Lands Administration and the fourth thing, which is ongoing, is solving the planning problem."

He rejected the claim that a large proportion of new building projects are earmarked for haredi families and don't solve the housing problem - for non-Orthodox Israelis. "The extra 15,000 building start isn't for the haredim. It's for everybody," the prime minister said.

On complaints that food prices haven't retreated and that a basket of staple foods for Passover costs more this year than in 2011, Netanyahu said, "What's raising these prices are monopolies and cartels."

He added that the government has played a role in prices: "The most important monopoly and cartel is the government. It's the one raising the price, including through import taxes, in order to finance the bureaucracy and the system of government officials. There are all sorts of barriers that allow interested parties to charge high prices."

It's being handled, he vowed.

The protest movement may complain that the government hasn't done anything, but the fact is, it isn't true, the prime minister said.

A respectful critique of fundamentalism

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Like Deborah Feldman, author of the current bestseller Unorthodox, French author Anouk Markovits also left a Satmar chassidic community as a young woman.

To be published next month, I Am Forbidden (Hogarth), her first English novel, examines the sheltered Satmar community she left behind. But rather than writing a memoir detailing her own experiences or a novel about a woman struggling to leave the community, she instead wrote a novel about a woman devoted to her life in the Satmar community of Williamsburg in Brooklyn.

I Am Forbidden is a respectful examination of the community from within. It spans generations, beginning in World War II Transylvania and ending in present time New York and Paris.

It begins with Zalman Stern, a yeshiva student in Szatmar, Transylvania, the birthplace of Satmar Chassidism. Zalman is an ilui, a wonder of Torah knowledge, and is said to have the most beautiful voice east of Vienna. During World War II, which he survives in Romania, he adopts Mila, an orphaned daughter of his yeshiva friend. She becomes very close with Zalman's eldest daughter, Atara, who is around the same age.

After the war, Zalman also "rescues" Josef Lichtenstein, an orphaned young boy who survived the Holocaust by hiding with his gentile housekeeper. When he approaches bar mitzvah age, Josef is sent to the Satmar community in Williamsburg.

Zalman also leaves his home, now under the oppressive yoke of communism, and settles with his growing family as a cantor in Paris. He is a pious, deeply religious follower of the Satmar rebbe who escaped Hungary on the infamous Kasztner train (Israel Kasztner made a deal with the Nazis to spirit some Jews to safety at the expense of others) and settled in Williamsburg.

Zalman is unbending in his devotion to Torah and is saddened that even in the Marais, the Jewish quarter of Paris, he can't find Jews who worship like him. He warns his children to be wary of "Jewish enlightenment" and "modernism" and rails against Zionism. When the girls are caught riding a bicycle in the Luxembourg Gardens on Shabbat, he gives Atara a severe beating while Mila watches in fear.

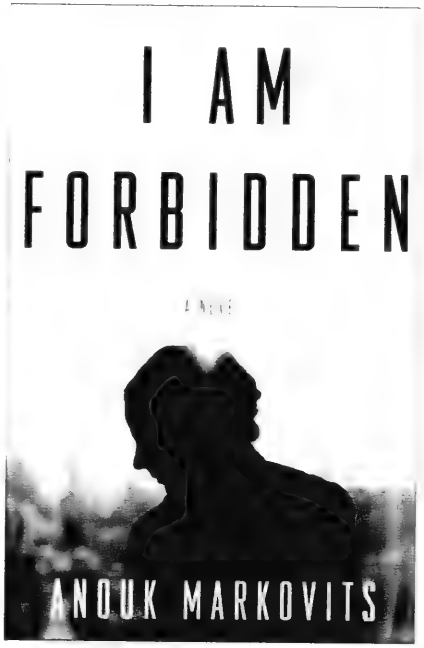
This is the first time that Atara, who is probably based on the author's own life, considers rebelling.

Although they attend a Jewish school, Mila and Atara, in their long skirts and thick stockings, are ostracized by teachers and students, especially when they do not participate in celebrations marking Israel's independence.

While Atara grows more independent and strong-willed, sneaking out to libraries to read "forbidden" books, Mila remains pious and devout. The two are sent to a seminary for girls in England where Mila is thrilled to be among the first generation of chassidic women studying Torah.

But Atara becomes disillusioned. She refuses to accept the school's teaching that pogroms, and even the Holocaust, were the result of a lack of faith and that a person who fails to connect Jewish tragedies to sin causes further suffering.

Could she marry a chassidic man, one her father chooses, embrace an Orthodox life and raise children who were forbidden to read secular books?



She asks her father if she could leave the seminary and study medicine at a secular university. Her father flatly refuses, and so Atara runs away and Zalman curses her and banishes her from his sight.

Mila also doesn't return to the seminary as she is of marrying age, and her father accepts a wedding proposal from Josef, now a yeshiva student under the guidance of the Rebbe.

The two settle in Williamsburg and have a seemingly loving relationship. There's no doubt that unlike her sister, Mila is devoted to her faith, her husband and the Rebbe. She loves the chassidic enclave she lives in, where Jews are not afraid to be Jews.

She wants only to do her duty by giving her husband offspring and enviously watches the other women pushing prams and dragging a train of children behind. Mila dutifully keeps track of her permitted and not-permitted days, but month after month, year after year, she remains childless. (Markovits describes some of the more extreme practices in the chassidic household particularly when it comes to sex and bodily fluids.)

It is customary that after 10 years with no children, the husband can divorce his wife. Mila begs her husband to do a fertility test, thinking he might be the problem, but Josef refuses on the grounds that spilling his seed in vain is forbidden.

The novel races to the present when a secret Mila kept all this time threatens to banish them from the community.

Given that the narrative spans around 80 years, Markovits does a good job of keeping the story tight and concise (the book is just under 300 pages). It makes for a fast and engaging read.

And while there's no doubt that the author is criticizing not just Chassidism but all rigid fundamentalism, she does it in a respectful and non-aggressive way. The heroine of the novel is, after all, Mila, who remains devout and faithful despite all that's thrown her way.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

AGO EXHIBIT PAYS TRIBUTE TO DONOR AYALA ZACKS

Chagall, Degas, Matisse, Modigliani and Picasso are among the celebrated artists represented in A Tribute to Ayala Zacks (1912-2011), an exhibition currently on view at the Art Gallery of Ontario that honours both Ayala Zacks and the late Samuel Zacks for their longtime philanthropy towards the AGO.

The 17 pieces in the show focus on the female body and feature key works by women artists among the more than 300 works that Ayala donated to the AGO after Samuel's death in 1970. The exhibition also explores the bond between Toronto and Jerusalem, the two cities on which Zacks showered her devotion and generosity.

A third track of the show explores Zacks' heroic exploits during World War II and her role in the founding and building of Israel.

Born in Jerusalem, Ayala lost a husband in the war and met the Canadian-born Samuel in Switzerland. They were married in 1947. Prominent Canadian art collectors whose gifts form the basis of the AGO's modern European art collection, the couple also made major donations to Queen's University, the Hazor Archaeological Museum and the Royal Ontario Museum. The AGO exhibition remains on view until February 2013.

Names in the News: Riga-born cellist Mischa Maisky was gaining a reputation as one of the Soviet Union's prize musicians in the late 1960s when his sister left for Israel and his career took a turn for the worse. While still a student at the Moscow Conservatory, he was harassed by the state security police. In 1970, he was arrested for buying a tape recorder on the black market and sentenced to 18 months in a labour camp.

After his release he moved to Israel and in 1973 gave a performance at Carnegie Hall in New York. He also performed in Toronto in 1978. Only in the glasnost era of the mid-1990s did he return to Russia. He has made more than 30 recordings with the Vienna Philharmonic and Berlin Philharmonic, London Symphony, Israel Philharmonic and others.

Maisky returns to Toronto to perform with the Moscow Soloists Chamber Orchestra, led by conductor, and viola soloist Yuri Bashmet. Roy Thomson Hall, Thursday, May 3, 8 p.m. $55 to $115. 416-872-4255, www.roythomson.com

Turning 50 gave Calgary comedian 'lots of material'

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Danny Freedman began performing standup comedy one day before his 46th birthday and he's never looked back.

Now 50, the comedian has told jokes at clubs across the country and most recently co-produced an act called Two Jews... Two Muslims and A Redneck... A Comedy Show.

On March 31, he debuted his show at the Comedy Bar in downtown Toronto with his partner, Mike Collins, a comic from Sydenham, Ont.

"Mike and I discussed the idea of having comedians with different cultures or even different nationalities. The show isn't so much about Jews and Muslims, but rather those are the faiths of the comics who will be performing in the show," he said.

Collins, the redneck, was the host for the evening and Freedman was the opening act. Ali Hassan and Faisal Butt, both Muslims, were the next to perform, and Simon Rakoff, who's Jewish and has been a professional comedian for more than 25 years, was the show's headliner.

Freedman said he got his start in comedy in Calgary, where he was living at the time. "I literally just woke up one morning and decided that I wanted to try performing comedy. I had never before considered performing of any kind, so I can only presume that I had a dream that night about performing."

He went online and requested a spot on an amateur night at a local comedy club and in June found himself performing in front of 130 people. He has since performed about 30 times at Absolute Comedy in Ottawa, which he said is considered to be "one of the finest, if not the finest, comedy club in all of North America."

He performs regularly at Absolute Comedy in Toronto and has also taken the stage at Yuk Yuks in Toronto, Ottawa, Edmonton and Calgary, and at the House of Comedy in Niagara Falls, Ont. Last month, Freedman went to Florida to visit his mother and was added to the lineup at the Fort Lauderdale Comedy Club.

Happy Days' Mrs. C. to appear in Lost in Yonkers

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Marion Ross, best known as the lovable Mrs. Cunningham, or Mrs. C., on the 1974-'84 TV sitcom Happy Days, isn't playing even likable when she comes to Toronto.

She'll be tackling the role of the intimidating Grandma Kurnitz in the Neil Simon play Lost in Yonkers, presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company.

The play focuses on two young brothers, Arty and Jay, who are left in the care of their grandmother, in Yonkers, N.Y., during the summer of 1942. This is Ross' first time in this role, although she played a Jewish grandmother in the TV series Brooklyn Bridge.

Ross says she understands Grandma Kurnitz completely and has great sympathy for her. She says Simon is funny, but her character is hateful and she doesn't intend to soften her at all.

Marion Ross

"There's very little growth in this old woman. She doesn't change. All she knows and teaches her children is to survive at any cost. I have seen that in many older women who have had to carry the load of raising their children alone. They are tired and they are mad.

"She's obviously come to America after World War I, because this is a World War II story. She runs an ice cream store and works six days a week. She has lost her husband and two of her children. When she was a child in Germany, they beat her with sticks and she learned to be tough," Ross says.

"Her one daughter, Bella, didn't learn to speak until she was five years old. She was born with scarlet fever and is not quite right. She has one son who is a criminal on the street, and she has a needy son, whose wife has died and has to take this job on the road salvaging metals, so he asks his mother to take his two boys."

Ross says the grandmother objects to taking care of the boys, citing that she's an old woman who has already raised six children and who feels life has treated her poorly, and has no room in her home, but her daughter, Bella, invites the boys to move in.

Ross will share the stage with Linda Kash as Bella, Sheila McCarthy as Gert, Ari Cohen as Louie, Alesdandro Costantini as Jay, and Jesse Shimko as his brother, Arty. The theatre's co-artistic director, David Eisner, makes his Harold Green Theatre debut in the role of Eddie, and the play is directed by Jim Warren.

Ross has five Emmy Award nominations to her name, including two for Mrs. C.

The Minnesota-born actress, whose husband, Paul, died last July, feels she needs to keep her life filled up and is looking forward to her time in Toronto, having worked here in the past on television series. While here, she plans to meet with members of her late Canadian mother's side of the family, who live in Ontario.

Now living in San Fernando Valley, Calif., in a country-style home she calls Happy Days Farm, she is the mother of two grown children and has three grandchildren. Although not Jewish herself, her daughter, Ellen Kreamer, who wrote for Friends and The New Adventures of Old Christine and just created the show I Hate My Teenage Daughter, is married to a Jew. Her son, Jim Meskimen, is an actor and an impressionist.

Lost in Yonkers is at the Jane Mallett Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, from May 12 to June 10. For tickets to the play and Conversations on the Green, to hear host Ralph Benmergui interview Ross on May 14 at 8 p.m., call 416-366-7723 or visit online at www.stlc.com.

Broadway revival of West Side Story to play T.O.

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Fresh out of college, Alexandra Frohlinger landed the role of "Anybody's" in the first national tour of the Broadway revival of West Side Story, a role she played while in college.

"I did West Side Story in college at the Boston Conservatory, and I got to play Anybody's in my sophomore year," she says. "It was wonderful to come back to the role after having completed my training – with new insights, knowing now what I didn't know then."

Dancap Productions is bringing West Side Story to the Toronto Centre for the Arts next month.

"What is really special about this production is that it is the first production in the history of the show that Anybody's sings the Somewhere ballad in the ballet in Act 2, " she says.

Frohlinger, an actor, dancer and singer, might be known to Canadian audiences as a top 10 finalist in the first season of the CBC Television show Triple Sensation in 2007.

She describes her character, Anybody's, as a tomboy. "She is really the only character in the play that is totally unloved and has nowhere to belong," Frohlinger says.

"Anybody's is an outcast, she just doesn't fit in. She's called Anybody's because she is willing to accept any love from anyone," says the Winnipeg native, who's been on tour with the show since October 2010. Toronto is one of the last North American stops before the show travels to Japan and then finishes in August.

West Side Story is a modern musical adaptation of Romeo and Juliet, which debuted on Broadway in 1957. Written by Arthur Laurents, with songs by Leonard Bernstein and Stephen Sondheim, the original musical was set in New York's Lower East Side, with tensions flaring between Jews and Catholics during the Passover and Easter holidays.

The authors felt uninspired and shelved the project. Years later, Laurents changed the conflict from religion to race and mounted the show, making it a hit with a message that still resonates today.

Frohlinger says there is something in the story that speaks to the human condition, about love trying to conquer evil. "In the most simple terms, it is really about... love [surviving] in a world of animosity, hatred and racism.

"West Side Story is my favourite musical, and aside from the important message of the play, it is just a wonderful show... the story, the music and the dancing."

From the age of seven, Frohlinger knew she wanted to sing, dance and act professionally. Her first foray into performing musicals was at Winnipeg's Rady Jewish Community Centre's production of Oliver.

Frohlinger says her goal is to perform one day on Broadway but adds that she is living her dream right now, having worked with West Side Story's playwright, Laurents, before he died last year. Frohlinger has enjoyed seeing North America while on tour and taking in what each city's restaurants, boutiques and thrift stores have to offer.

Frohlinger's credits include Les Feux Follets at the Charlottetown Festival; The Drowsy Chaperone at the Manitoba Theatre Centre; in Dry Cold Productions' The Secret Garden, and productions with Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and Rainbow Stage. While living in Boston, she performed with the Boston Pops Orchestra as a soloist in the Baseball Night concert.

West Side Story runs at the Toronto Centre for the Arts from May 8 to June 3. Tickets can be purchased at www.DancapTickets.com, or by calling 416-644-3665 or 1-866-950-7469.

Comedy is an escape from life

"I enjoy being a comedian because making people laugh makes me happy," he said. "I also am an avid writer, and it gives me great pleasure to write a joke and then to try that joke in front of an audience. Sometimes the new joke will work the first time, but often it needs to be tweaked."

Freedman went to a comedy seminar where the instructor told the group that "comedy is medicine." As people age and face some of the harsh realities of growing old, listening to comedy is "a fantastic escape from reality," he said.

Most of the material that Freedman has written recently is about turning 50, including dating at 50, emotional and physical changes, and having parents that are also obviously aging.

"I was taught by a professional comedian that the best comedy comes from within – what is happening in my life and in my mind – and also from daily living and daily events. Turning 50 years of age was a real shock to me, and it has provided me with lots of great comedy material," he said.

At this point in his career, Freedman is still considered an amateur comedian. He's had some paid gigs, but the majority have been volunteer acts. "Comedy, like most career choices, is a very competitive endeavour. There's an incredible amount of very funny and talented comedians out there. I do hope one day that my writing and joke telling will lead to full-time work," he said.

Freedman currently sells life insurance to make a living. "It is a great career for a comedian as, since I am my own boss, it allows me the freedom and flexibility to travel to great out-of-town gigs."

Freedman said there are many struggles he's faced since he began performing. "One struggle certainly would be my age. Many of the other comics that I perform with and spend time with at shows are in their early 20s. I know that a lot of them like me and respect me for beginning my comedy career at a rather advanced age, but I also many times feel like a bit of an outcast because of my age. I have a comedian friend who is about 20 years younger than me, and she refers to me as her fake dad."

He said another major obstacle is that he's always been a numbers person. "I studied business in university. I always enjoyed a good mathematical problem, where if you worked it out correctly, there would always be an answer. Comedy is very subjective. I can perform in front of a crowd, and some of the crowd will love my comedy and others won't like it at all."

Freedman said his love of writing and performing is what keeps him motivated to be a comedian. "If one day I do become a professional comic, that would be wonderful, but if I don't, I will always consider these years and all the laughs that I've had and the wonderful friends that I've made to be lasting memories."

His advice for new comics is to "practise, practise, practise. It is essential to get as much stage time as you possibly can. There are open mics available in Toronto seven nights a week for up-and-coming comics to work on their material and their delivery."

Over the past six months, Freedman said he's pushed himself to perform as often as he can. "I plan on performing even more in the upcoming future. I also plan to continue promoting shows as often as I can. Comedy has become such a passion for me. I can't ever see the day when I will stop performing."

Once Brad Cotton started writing, he couldn't stop

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Brad Cotton, 34, said he is a writer "not by choice but by compulsion."

Cotton, whose debut novel, A Work in Progress, is available in stores and online, said that while writing is now part of his regular routine, he only recently turned his passion into a career.

"I got a very late start in writing because any raw talent I had – I won school poetry and speech-writing competitions without even trying – wasn't recognized or encouraged, but instead sort of shrugged off," he said.

"The Jewish baby boomer tradition of churning out doctors, lawyers and accountants was a yoke around my neck, and no one ever told me how to take it off, or even that I could."

Raised in a middle-class family in Toronto, Cotton's "moderately conservative parents didn't have the arts play a role in their upbringing and knew little or nothing of it to pass on to their kids," he said.

"My older brother was a math whiz, my older sister [was into] science, but I excelled at recess and principal office visits. I was the black sheep."

It wasn't until Cotton left Associated Hebrew School for the public school system in Grade 7 that he "was even exposed to the idea of art as something beyond childish arts and crafts."

He was handed a trumpet in his music class and later taught himself to play guitar.

"I tried to paint and came up well short of talent. It didn't even occur to me to consider writing as a viable art until I began to read more. I read and read and read."

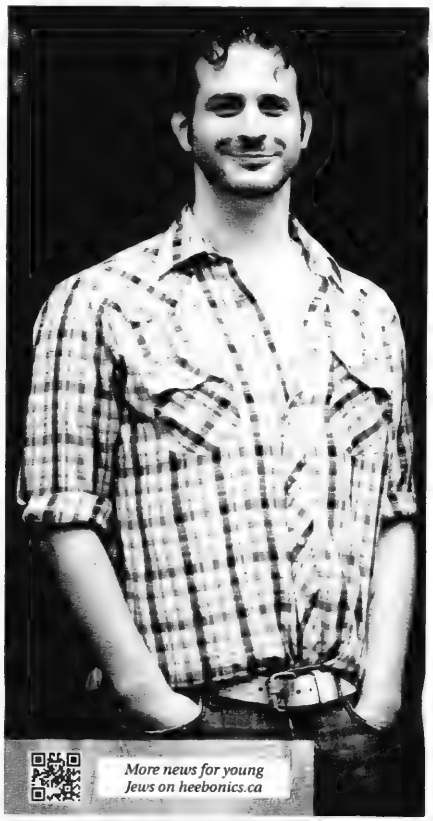
Cotton said he started writing in high school when he and his classmates were encouraged to keep a daily journal.

"Mostly short stories and misguided poetry resulted. I never thought to take it seriously and have since lost all that stuff. To me, it was just a hobby. In university, my parents were still unaware of how to encourage or support an artistic route, and I was still too green and unaware to pick up on it myself."

In his early 20s, Cotton started freelance writing for magazines, but he said he couldn't make a living at it.

"By chance, I ran into a friend, and subsequent conversations led me to sell my soul to the corporate machine and I became an advertising copywriter," he said.

His work schedule and responsibilities prevented him from writing for his own enjoyment until a few years ago, when he decided he "simply couldn't hold off any longer."



More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Brad Cotton

He sat down, started typing, and has since completed three novels and one screenplay. He is now in the early stages of his fourth book.

A Work in Progress tells the story of Danny Bayle, a writer whose life is in shambles. His girlfriend has left him, and his grandfather has just passed away. Unable to focus on writing, he ventures into the world in an attempt to jumpstart a new life. He meets some interesting characters, and his new friends begin to influence what could be the story of his life.

"I suppose I find writing therapeutic," Cotton said. "It's just something I can do with all the thoughts and ideas I collect in my head. Writers tend to be watchers or critics of life, for better or worse. That's what writing is, really, an expression of how one sees the world."

Cotton completed his first novel in his early 20s. "It was a little too amateurish to attempt publishing," he said.

He spent the next few years practising and polishing his writing and began A Work in Progress when he felt he could "greatly surpass" his original attempt.

"I can't say A Work in Progress was inspired by one single thing, but instead was made up of many smaller ideas that seemed to fit together well," he said. 'The main theme, however, is loss, which is something to which everyone can relate."

After "a wretched parade of single-page rejection letters one after the other," Cotton said he received a positive response from Now or Never Publishing.

"Trying to get a book published is certainly not easy, nor is it for the weak of constitution. As a writer, or artist, or musician, you have to be able to deal with criticism on an ongoing basis. If you're in the business of padding your ego, you should be looking for a different job."

Cotton said he's "delighted" that A Work in Progress has been published, although he doesn't consider himself successful yet.

"Success as an author comes if and when you can reach an audience. Small or large, a readership is really what makes a writer successful. If your writing isn't read and enjoyed, or at least considered provocative in some way, it's just words on a page, like a menu, only you can't order food off a bad novel."

As an author, Cotton is "chiefly motivated by improvement."

He said he's not overly competitive by nature and likes to think he's aware of his limitations.

"What keeps me going as a writer is that I know I have yet to reach my full potential."

Cotton's "humble" advice to any writer is to keep going.

"If you're a good writer, keep writing, if you're a bad writer, keep writing. Talk to other writers, editors, publishers, agents and even readers. Ask people to read what you've written and accept all criticism for what it's worth."

He has already completed a second novel called The Boundless. Cotton said the book explores whether it's possible to leave your entire life behind and start a new one.

Website helps students get relevant WORK EXPERIENCE

Ben Wise

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Ben Wise is a graduate of the University of Western Ontario's Ivey School of Business who, like many other grads, had a difficult time finding a job.

Like many of his friends, most of his work experience consisted of being a summer-camp counsellor, which, as he put it, "wasn't exactly turning heads in the business world. I struggled because I didn't have enough work experience," said Wise.

In Canada, youth unemployment reached a high of 30 per cent just a few months ago and is still higher than average at 17 per cent.

Many students pursue liberal arts degrees, which do not have a career path as a business or engineering degree, and statistics show that 82 per cent of students are enrolled in programs that only 10 per cent of employers hire from.

One of the greatest hurdles students encounter is a paradox – you can't get a job without experience and you can't get experience without a job. Wise hoped that there might be a way to solve this problem.

He did end up finding a job, but his job search left him with a passion to help recent graduates find meaningful employment. Ten years later, while working at a small consulting firm, Wise would see the valuable work student interns were doing.

"We would have interns working 12 months out of the year, and I was constantly amazed by the quality of work they would produce and how much you could trust them to get done. If students were capable and eager to do this work, and businesses are eager to get this help, I thought, why not bring it together?"

That's when the idea for SpringTern developed. SpringTern is a not-for-profit business, connecting students and businesses to complete short-term volunteer projects.

It is specifically designed for small businesses that may not be able to afford to hire a part-time employee or intern, but need to get a small project done. Students, in turn, gain work experience, expand their networks and get a reference on completion of the project.

"I think that when students are in school, they are focusing a lot on their classes, which is obviously not a bad thing, but especially in later years, you start thinking, 'I know I'll need a job after I graduate,' but you assume you'll deal with it then. Suddenly, you're a graduate, and you don't have the support structure of university, which makes it even harder to find a job," he said.

"A lot of universities have great programs, but the courses you take may not be directly applicable to a job, so a student has to show how to apply the soft skills they learned in university in the working world."

Wise, 29, grew up in the Jewish community of Thornhill, Ont. He attended Thornhill Secondary School and fondly recalls spending his summers with friends at Camp Walden in Muskoka.

He said these encounters helped him gain support for SpringTern.

"When I launched my company, a lot of the initial listings came from my personal network, especially the network I had made from those experiences, and it helped me find people to work with and bounce ideas off of," he said.

The Prosserman Jewish Community Centre was one of the first organizations to post a project on the SpringTern site.

During his undergraduate career, Wise spent a summer working at eBay. "It was a really cool role. It was a small team of about 25 people, so if you were an intern, everyone wanted to get you to help them. I met a lot of great people, many of whom I'm still in touch with," he said.

He then completed his MBA at Western's Ivey School of Business.

Now, he works as a Rich Media campaign manager at Google, while running SpringTern and his charity, Step by Step Africa, which fights HIV/AIDS in Africa by providing funding to partners in the region.

"After my undergraduate degree, I went to Ghana for nine months and I volunteered in an orphanage. I got exposed to issues surrounding HIV/AIDS, so when I came back, I set up the charity and I have been doing it for the last five or six years," he said.

He hopes that SpringTern helps ease students' difficulties searching for a job after graduation.

"It's a great way for business to meet young talent and for students to start professional networking," he said. "What I would love to see is someone who completes a project through SpringTern and then a few months later, starts working there full time."

Official regrets school's inclusion in sports group

ITA

DALLAS — The Beren Academy Orthodox Jewish day school should never have been accepted to the Texas Association of Private and Parochial Schools (TAPPS), the association's director told a Texas newspaper.

"We shouldn't have accepted them in the first place," TAPPS director Edd Burleson told the Dallas Morning News in a recent interview.

The Robert M. Beren Academy of Houston made international headlines in March after requesting that a semifinal championship basketball game be rescheduled to avoid a conflict with the Jewish Sabbath.

The game was rescheduled after a group of parents of students filed a lawsuit against the association. The team won the semifinal game, but went on to lose the final, also rescheduled to a later time on Saturday after the Sabbath was over.

Burleson told the newspaper that he believes that the association would have won the case if it had gone to court.

"If we had fought it, we would have won," Burleson told the newspaper. "But that would have taken weeks. We didn't have the time.

"What else would you want me to say?" Burleson said in the interview. "Want me to come up with some politically correct gobbledygook? I can't. I'm telling you that's how I feel."

TAPPS had said in a statement posted on its website following its decision not to change the semifinal that when the Beren Academy first met with the association's board in 2009 to discuss membership, it was told that tournament games are scheduled on Friday and Saturday, and that the school's athletic director said he "understood" and "did not see a problem."

The Texas Catholic Conference Education Department, representing 43 Texas Catholic high schools, told the Houston Chronicle that Burleson's comments came as a surprise and that the group is committed to reforms that will make TAPPS more welcoming to a diverse membership.

If Burleson's position remains the same, the department said, Catholic schools "will reconsider their future affiliation with TAPPS." It also said that in a meeting last week with TAPPS member schools, Burleson committed to working to resolve diversity issues.

TAPPS rejected a Muslim school from Houston for membership in 2010.

Curler wins Manitoba championship

Compiled by CJN Staff

WINNIPEG — Kyle Doering continues to excel on the pebbled ice.

The reigning Manitoba junior men's champion won his second straight Manitoba Boys 16 and Under championship when he defeated Winnipeg's Matt Dunstone 5-4 in the final at the St. Vital Curling Club, the Winnipeg Sun reported.

In another event held earlier, Doering defeated Dunstone 5-1 in an early-bird Canola Junior Men's Berth Bonspiel in Souris, Man. to win one of the two places in next year's provincials.

"It's awesome not to have to worry about qualifying now," the Sun quoted Doering saying. "Being the defending champion, it would be awful not to make it."

Doering, 16, went 9-3 in his first trip to the M&M Meat Shops Canadian Juniors, held in Napanee last February. His rink finished in third place overall.

Road hockey tournament to raise funds for kids

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Prosserman JCC and Chai Lifeline will host the inaugural "Game On" road hockey tournament to help raise funds for children dealing with pediatric disabilities and illness. All funds raised will go to support the participation of these youngsters in summer camps and sports programs.

The road hockey tournament will take place on June 17 at the Prosserman JCC, 4588 Bathurst St. From 300-400 people are expected to play, with another 1,000 spectators, supporters and volunteers to attend what is being billed "an event for the ages." Organizers are hoping to raise $100,000 at the event.

Individual adult players can register at a cost of $180, team registration is $1,000 and individual youth registration is $100. Teams are asked to collect pledges as well, with the top fundraisers eligible for prizes, including a chance to play in the celebrity all-star game.

Teams will be divided into adult and youth divisions and play at least three games. Each team must have a minimum of five players and a maximum of eight.

Four players per team will be on the road at one time, including one goalie. Players must bring their own equipment.

Mend fences: Life's too short

Dear Ella,

At every major holiday or family event, I encounter the same problem, and this Passover was no exception. My two nieces don't speak to one another.

I have not taken sides in their feud, but have expressed my opinion about it. Although I agreed with Deborah, the younger of the two sisters, that the events that started this feud were handled improperly, I said I would not exclude Daliah, her sister, from family functions. But Daliah would not attend any gathering if Deborah was going to be there.

After 10 years, Daliah finally concluded that she had missed out on enough family functions and accepted my invitation for Passover this year. When Deborah found out, she called the night before the seder to tell me that she and her family would not be attending.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

I later heard from their brother, Richard, that Deborah felt that "I had made my choice," and I believe she is angry with me now.

I refuse to be put in the middle of this war and don't want a repeat of this stress every holiday. It takes years off my life. How should I handle this?

Frustrated Auntie

Dear Frustrated Auntie,

Sometimes people get so caught up in their grudges and pride that they can't see past it and how it affects their children, spouses and extended families. Life is too short to hang on to this kind of animosity for more than 10 years, but this should not be your problem. This feud belongs to Deborah and Daliah, and if they can't see, or don't care, what it's doing to the rest of the family, I think you need to stop caring, too. Next time there's a family gathering, you're not going to be the one to choose between them. You need to drop the ball squarely in their court and let the chips fall where they may.

For your next gathering, send both of these gals an e-mail, and make sure to use both their names in the "send to" line.

It should read something like this:

Dear Deborah and Daliah,

On [insert date] we are having an [insert event]. I have invited the whole family.

First let me say that I love you both. In the past, you have made it very uncomfortable, forcing me to choose between the two of you, and I can't do it any longer. It would be very meaningful to me if you could put aside your differences and enjoy this important day with us. I know it would mean the world to the rest of the family as well.

I hope you give this some thought before you answer out of anger. Please let me know by [insert date] how many in your family will be attending. Once you get past the first five minutes, I promise you will enjoy catching up with everyone. Please don't let pride stand in your way. Life is too short. I hope more than anything to see you both on this special occasion.

Love [insert name]

Then sit back and wait for the reply. This isn't your problem. You didn't create it, and you shouldn't be in the middle of it. Go ahead and plan your event. If they can't get past this, unfortunately you'll have to get used to moving on without them. It will be their loss if they choose not to attend.

APPLE RASPBERRY MATZO BREI

2 tbsp. butter • 1 apple, peeled, diced • 1/2 c chopped pecans • 1/4 c brown sugar • 2 tbsp. lemon juice • 1/2 tsp. cinnamon • 8 matzo boards • 3 c boiling water • 6 eggs • 3 tbsp. sugar • 3 tbsp. butter • 1/2 c fresh raspberries

In heavy skillet, melt 2 tbsp. butter; add pecans stirring until fragrant. Remove from skillet and set aside. Saute apples in pan 4-5 min until soft. Add brown sugar; cook until apples are glazed. Remove from heat; add lemon juice, cinnamon, reserved pecans.

Break matzos into 2" pieces; place in large colander in sink. Slowly pour boiling water over using tongs to turn pieces once; drain. In lg bowl, beat eggs until foamy. Add 3 tbsp. sugar and mix well. Stir in matzo pieces until coated. Melt 3 tbsp. margarine in another large skillet over medium heat. Add matzo mixture, cook, stirring occasionally until golden brown 8-10 min. Stir in apple mixture; cook another couple of minutes until warm. Transfer to serving plate and sprinkle with raspberries.

No grey health-care tsunami coming

Last year was not a great year for seniors in Canada. There seemed to be an increased propensity to blame Canada's economic problems disproportionately on the costs of health care, and seniors seemed to be the villains, depending on the commentator.

There were media reports about the "problem" and what steps could be taken to change the course of seniors allegedly consuming economic resources.

I answered one interviewer by suggesting that we give everyone free cigarettes and encourage smoking so that by the time people reach 65, they would all keel over and die. That would save the government huge amounts of money for pensions and health care. The interviewer paused until it clicked that my comment was ironic. The benefits of health care and its miraculous impact on the longevity and well-being of our Canadian citizenry, including its seniors, were not acknowledged in the media.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

Historian Michael Bliss suggested that we should make users of the health-care system pay more for services through the income-tax system, based on use. However, that would have a very modest effect, as any extra revenues would come from tax-based charges to income, which for most seniors levels off considerably as they grow older.

A TD Bank study done last year also blew the "tsunami" horn, and its predictions included the projection that by 2030, health care would make up 80 per cent of the total provincial budget, up from the current 46 per cent. This did not take into account medical progress that often alters costs. For example, during the 1950s polio epidemic, the number of hospitalized, polio-afflicted patients in iron lungs seemed to be growing exponentially. But within a few years, the disease was vanquished with a vaccine that virtually eliminated it and its associated costs.

Of the 10 ways to cut health-care spending in Ontario suggested by the TD study, some specifically affect seniors. These included scaling back the Ontario Drug Benefit for high-income seniors so that it focuses on seniors in need. The problem with this suggestion is that the number of high-income seniors is small, so the health-care budget savings would be minimal.

Another suggestion was to increase bulk purchases of drugs to get better prices, which is already being done. The suggestion to incorporate a health-care benefit tax into the income-tax structure may increase revenues, but it would not change health-care utilization, as most use is not discretionary.

Seniors do not use medical care nor take medications for fun. The suggestion to take bolder action to promote healthy lifestyles is important, but while healthy lifestyles decrease the risk of certain conditions, they do not confer immortality.

The good news for seniors and policy makers is that two recent studies suggest that the "grey tsunami" poised to overwhelm the health-care system may be exaggerated. These studies found that of all the factors affecting the costs of health care, the aging population ranked low on the list of cost-drivers.

It is hoped that when the data presented in these studies are considered, the focus will be redirected elsewhere, rather than looking at seniors as the convenient scapegoat on which to blame increasing health-care costs, which although a challenge are not insurmountable.

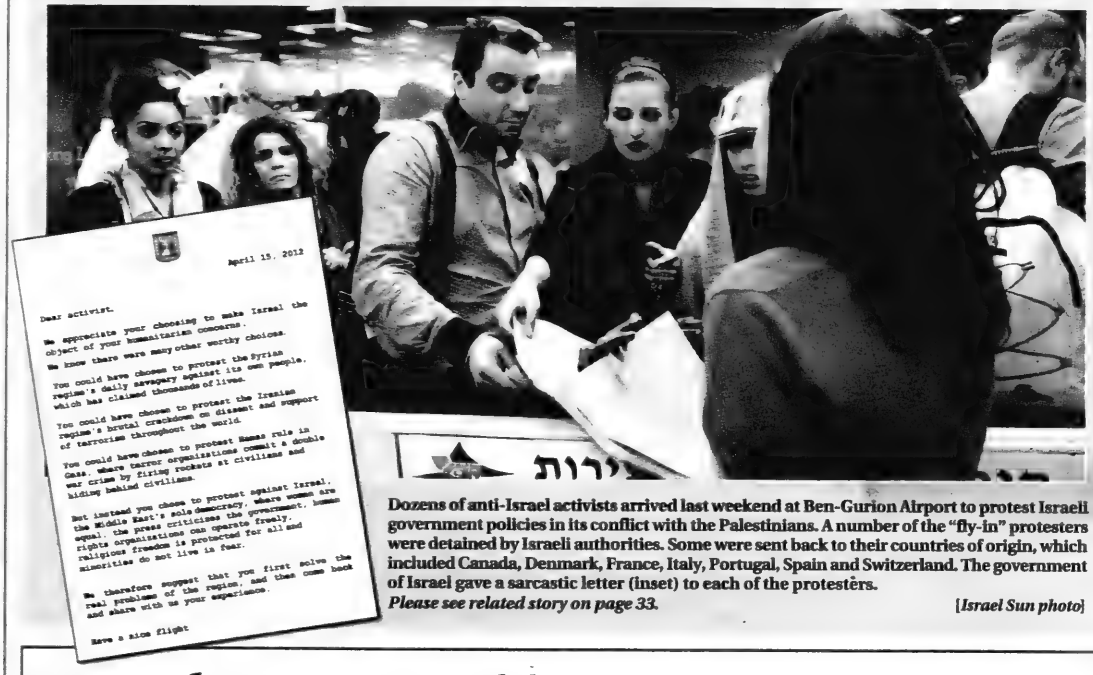
Anti-Israel activists land at Ben-Gurion



April 15, 2012

Dear activist,

We appreciate your choosing to make Israel the object of your humanitarian concerns.

We know there were many other worthy choices.

You could have chosen to protest the Syrian regime's daily savagery against its own people, which has claimed thousands of lives.

You could have chosen to protest the Iranian regime's brutal crackdown on dissent and support of terrorism throughout the world.

You could have chosen to protest Hamas rule in Gaza, where terror organizations commit a double war crime by firing rockets at civilians and hiding behind civilians.

But instead you chose to protest against Israel, the Middle East's sole democracy, where women are equal, the press criticizes the government, human rights organizations can operate freely, religious freedom is protected for all and minorities do not live in fear.

We therefore suggest that you first solve the real problems of the region, and then come back and share with us your experience.

Have a nice flight

Dozens of anti-Israel activists arrived last weekend at Ben-Gurion Airport to protest Israeli government policies in its conflict with the Palestinians. A number of the "fly-in" protesters were detained by Israeli authorities. Some were sent back to their countries of origin, which included Canada, Denmark, France, Italy, Portugal, Spain and Switzerland. The government of Israel gave a sarcastic letter (inset) to each of the protesters.

Jewish Agency tackles communal divisions

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you're a volunteer with aspirations to do something good for your community, focusing on the unity of the Jewish People will certainly test your skills.

You might want to start with something a little easier, like finding a cure for cancer or turning the United Nations into a force for good, before you tackle that thorny subject.

Jewish disunity seems to be about as old as the Jewish People itself. The Bible tells us the story of Joseph and his brothers who sold him into slavery. Then there was the split of the 10 northern tribes from those centred on Jerusalem, and 1,000 years later Jerusalem and the Temple were destroyed – events rabbinic sages attributed to baseless hatred among Jews.

Today there are rifts between and within the various religious, political and other streams of Jewry.

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), an organization meant to serve all the Jewish People, is addressing these divisive issues. It recently established the committee on the unity of the Jewish People, co-chaired by Shoel Silver, a Toronto-area businessman with a long history of involvement in the agency.

UJA Head Retires

HAMILTON — The executive director of UJA Federation of Hamilton, Gerald Fisher, will be retiring at the end of July after 11 years in the position, the federation announced earlier this month. In his resignation letter, Fisher cited "his ongoing recovery from recent cardiac surgery" as a key reason for the decision, the federation said.

Arab MK Speaks

OTTAWA — Israeli Arab MK Ahmad Tibi was slated to speak in Ottawa April 17 as a guest of the Ottawa Palestine Solidarity Network, an anti-Israel group formed in 2006 by unions, students, and community and faith groups. Tibi, the deputy speaker of the Knesset, was first elected in 1999 and was one of four MKs elected on the United Arab List in 2006 and 2009. A Hebrew University-trained physician and former adviser to Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, Tibi was scheduled to speak at an event marking Land Day, the day many Palestinians and their supporters mourn the birth of Israel in 1948.

Man Attacked

KIEV — A Jewish man was attacked after he left a seder at a shul in Kiev. The man, 25, was found the night of April 8, nearly a full day after the attack, with serious head injuries believed to be from glass bottles. He is in critical condition in a Kiev hospital. He also had bruises on his upper body. After a day of searching, he was found in an area near the synagogue, where attacks by neo-Nazis have occurred in the past, Yaakov Zilberman, director of the Kiev Jewish community, told Ynet. Police are reportedly reluctant to investigate the attack as an anti-semitic hate crime and are looking into the possibility he tripped in the street. Zilberman said he believes the man was targeted because he was wearing a kippah when he left the shul.

Feld Carr Feted

NEW YORK — Torontonian Judy Feld Carr will receive the Simon Wiesenthal Center's (SWC) Medal of Valor April 19 for three decades of work to free Jews prohibited from leaving Syria. She'll receive the award at the SWC's annual tribute dinner, to be held in New York. Others being honoured include the Tuskegee Airmen, African-American pilots in World War II, for breaking racial barriers, as well as Thomas Secunda, founding partner of Bloomberg, who will get SWC's humanitarian award for his philanthropic work.

Commodore Computers Founder Dies

Jack Tramiel

SAN FRANCISCO — Jack Tramiel, the Polish-born Holocaust survivor who founded Commodore Business Machines in Toronto in 1955 and later sold millions of Commodore 64 computers, died April 8 of heart failure in Palo Alto, Calif. He was 83.

Tramiel's family was confined to the Lodz Ghetto and he was liberated by the U.S. Army from the Ahlem labour camp in Germany in April 1945. He immigrated to the United States in 1947 with his wife, a Bergen-Belsen survivor.

In 1952, he opened a typewriter shop in the Bronx, N.Y., but moved to Toronto in 1955, where he had family, when he learned Canadian law would allow him to exclusively import Italian typewriters.

He moved Commodore to California in 1968, and in 1977, it came out with the PET Computer, putting it in competition with Apple and Tandy. The PET was followed in 1980 by the VIC-20, the first computer under $300, and in 1982 by the massively successful Commodore 64 , which sold for half as much as its main Apple competitor. It also had colour graphics and was the first personal computer with an audio synthesizer chip.

Tramiel resigned from the company abruptly in 1984 and bought the video-game division of Atari Corp.. After Atari lost ground to newer gaming competitors, he sold his stake and retired in the mid-1990s.

TJFF keeps growing after 20 years

Jewish film festival opens May 3

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

The 20th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival opens May 3 at the Cineplex Odeon Varsity with the English-Canadian première of A Bottle in the Gaza Sea, a France-Canada co-production.

The movie is about a teenage Israeli girl who receives an e-mail response from a young Palestinian, who calls himself "Gazaman," after he retrieves her message of peace from a bottle that had been thrown into the Mediterranean Sea.

A Bottle in the Gaza Sea is one of 96 films from some 15 countries to be screened at the festival, which runs until May 13 at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema, the Al Green Theatre and several other venues around town.

In 1993, its first year of operation, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) showed 35 films over five days at the unrefurbished 900-seat Bloor Cinema (now the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema). At the time there were lineups around the block for the feature attraction, Black to the Promised Land, which had to be screened three times after writer Michele Landsberg gave it a rave review in the Toronto Star.

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

"They thought of everything."

Commemorations of peoplehood

From the editor's desk...

We are constantly reminded, and validly so, that the Exodus of the Israelites – our ancestors – from their slavery in Egypt has been one of the most universally affecting and influential themes in western civilization. The story is an explicit testimonial to the power of belief and to the power of hope. One would be hard pressed to think of another narrative that has as meaningfully inspired the hearts of men and women across so wide an ecumenical swath.

But even as Miriam leads the awestruck former slaves in singing a thankful song of universal significance after the miracle of the Red Sea, she is first and foremost leading her own people. Even after they experienced the frightful 10 plagues, nothing so irrevocably convinced the former slaves that their slave masters were finally vanquished than the unbelievable result at the Red Sea.

At the foot of the holy mountain of Sinai, the former rabble of slaves began the long, arduous, intergenerational process of understanding freedom and becoming free men and women.

Thus, though many outside the Jewish faith have applied the lessons of the Exodus for their own instructional purposes, we must never forget that it is the Exodus that launches the divinely scripted saga of the peoplehood of the Children of Israel. The covenant at Sinai, which we recall, discuss and celebrate during the Passover seder, marks the beginning of the Jews as a people.

Passover is but the first of a quadruplicate of links on the steel chain of Jewish history, hammer blows on the anvil of collective memory, that come in quick succession in the months of Nisan and Iyar.

Barely one week after Passover ends, we commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah on the 27th day of Nisan. (See the editorial and the Perspectives essay.)

And then barely one week after that, on the fourth and fifth day of Iyar, respectively, we mark Yom Hazikaron – Remembrance Day for the fallen of the State of Israel – and celebrate Yom Ha'atzma'ut, Israel's independence Day. (The community-wide commemoration of Yom Hazikaron in Toronto will be held at Beth Tzedec Congregation on April 24.)

Unless one feels deep in one's essence a sense of belonging to the tiny, remarkable group we call the Jewish People, it is very difficult to feel the special connectivity between these four calendar events.

Alas, for so many of the younger generation, schooled less in the traditions, faith, history, literature and culture of our people, but rather more in a milieu lacking any endearment to Judaism and suffused with distorted portrayals of Israel, that feeling of special connectivity is as familiar to them as is the secret work at the CERN laboratory for particle physics in Europe. It may be vaguely familiar, but they are mostly untouched by its meaning. How sorrowfully sad that is.

Not to grasp, or to understand, or to catch on to, or to celebrate the historic – I would even add the metaphysical – enormity of the rise of the sovereign Jewish state at the near midpoint of the last century is to fail to see the wondrousness of the place of mankind in the flow of time.

After the recent death of journalist Mike Wallace, a film clip surfaced on the Internet of an interview he conducted in May 1958, 10 years after the rise of Israel, with the incomparable Israeli diplomat Abba Eban.

Wallace was his trademark "I'll-show-you-how-tough-I-am" self trying to steer Eban into answering questions about Jews, Judaism, Zionism and dual loyalty that Wallace considered to be hard-hitting and, obviously, clever. But Wallace was no match for the scholar and scholarly Eban.

"We believe that Israel's emergence is the greatest collective event in the history of the Jewish People, and that there is no pride and no dignity for a Jew such as those to be found in giving aid and sustenance to Israel in the great hour of her resurgence," Eban explained to Wallace asking, "whether a Jew would be less of a Jew if he were opposed to Zionism."

Earlier, Eban had succinctly and incisively described the hour of Israel's resurgence as occurring at "the climax of the Jewish People's agony."

Wallace hectored Eban again with the same question. Eban responded again with words and meaning that vastly outstripped Wallace's self-centred questioning, and probably, understanding.

"I would say that a man who opposed the State of Israel, and the great movement which brought it about, would be in revolt against the most constructive and creative events in the life of the Jewish People, and it's a fact that the great majority of our kinsmen everywhere, are exalted and uplifted by these events."

Can we say today with the same quiet confidence of that of ambassador Eban in 1958 that the great majority of our kinsmen everywhere are exalted and uplifted by the event of the Jewish People's sovereign return to history?

If we cannot, then it is our task to enable us to say that it is so once again.

Kids take leadership roles in youth network

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Greater Toronto Area: meet the Jewish Youth Network (JYN.) Formerly the Chabad Youth Network (CYN), the five-year-old non-profit organization has changed its name to reflect its mandate and broader clientele as it attracts teens from across the Jewish community.

Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas and Chani Nachlas founded the Jewish Youth Network. (Ben Katan photo)

"Over the last few years, our spectrum has been widening. We've been engaging more youth and teens from all kinds of Jewish backgrounds and affiliations – some with none at all," said Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas, who co-founded the organization with his wife, Chani.

The JYN prides itself on drawing teens from all walks of life and parts of the Jewish community to social, educational and volunteer programming.

"The name 'Jewish Youth Network' more represents our clientele, and the student base we're serving. We want to be inclusive of everyone, whether you're Orthodox, Reform or unaffiliated," he said.

Throughout the year, the grassroots organization runs Torah 4 Teens, youth lounges, retreats, Hebrew school and leadership programs. After Passover, they are taking a group on a Shabbaton to Washington, D.C., to tour the city and visit the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum.

The JYN also runs teen aid and community service programs through a program called Teens for the Community.

"We're continuing to expand our educational and social events, and recently we've had hundreds come to volunteer and co-ordinate volunteer initiatives," Rabbi Nachlas said.

He hopes his organization will help keep young people attached to Israel, each other, and Judaism.

The group recently held a matzah drive to help needy families at Passover and organized a basketball fundraiser.

Rabbi Nachlas believes the organization has been successful because the teens involved have been able to take ownership of the programs.

"In this day and age, in the era of social media, the world has changed a lot," he said. "The JYN is very much run from the bottom up, with kids taking serious leadership roles. All of it is done and led by youth, and that's key to staying relevant."

Rabbi Nachlas says the programs themselves vary from year to year to better align with the interests of current participants. "Our goal is to inspire the Jewish youth. How that's done will change, and kids will steer us to keep us engaging," he said.

Currently, the JYN also runs its own video channel, which can be found through their website at jewishyouth.ca.

"We allow for the expression of individuals, because it makes kids feel like it's something of their own. That's why they're excited to get their friends on board," Rabbi Nachlas said.

The JYN runs its activities out of two drop-in centres, one at Bathurst Street and Highway 407 and the other at Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue.

Bat mitzvah girl raising money for soup kitchens

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

When it comes to bat mitzvahs, most 12-year-old girls are busy deciding on a theme, a dress and a DJ. When Sydney Cohn started thinking about her bat mitzvah, she wanted to make it a meaningful experience.

Sydney Cohn designs bracelets to help others in the community.

She decided to design bracelets to be sold to her family and friends, with all proceeds donated to charity.

"I wanted to make charity part of my bat mitzvah because when I become a woman, I want to help the community," Sydney said.

Infusing meaning into Jewish rituals runs in her family. When her brother celebrated his bar mitzvah, he collected socks for Ve'ahavta, a Canadian humanitarian and relief organization.

A Grade 7 student at Robbins Hebrew Academy day school in Toronto, Sydney said the school's emphasis on tikkun olam (repairing the world) and her family's community-oriented values motivated her to start this project.

"A few weeks ago, the Beth Sholom bar and bat mitzvah program took the kids to Out of the Cold, to help serve dinner to homeless people," said Miriam Blumstock, Sydney's mother. "We have delivered Passover boxes, done book and toy drives and sponsored community dinners at shelters. We're always trying to make the kids aware of how fortunate they are and how important it is to help others."

Combining her interest in fashion and art, Sydney decided to design the bracelets herself, with the word "souperhero" written on the bracelets.

"When you're helping the community, you're a superhero, but I spell it 'souperhero' because the money is going to Soup Sisters, and to Leket Israel, the national food bank in Israel," Sydney said.

Soup Sisters is a non-profit organization that provides homemade soup to 20 residential shelters across Canada. The proceeds for Leket Israel will help fund their Sandwiches for Kids program, which prepares more than 7,000 sandwiches daily for needy children in 102 schools in Israel.

Sydney has sold 130 bracelets since she began this project in early March.

"I'm really proud of her. It's her idea, her design, her initiative and she's really taken the lead. I hope she sells them all and raises awareness. I think it will be a big feeling of accomplishment for her," Blumstock said.

Shul hosts Out of the Cold art show

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Beth Sholom Synagogue, the location for a weekly Out of the Cold program the shul hosts with Beth Tzedec Congregation, will also be the venue for an upcoming art show and sale featuring works by participants in the program.

Out of the Cold is a volunteer-run program based in churches and synagogues that provides food and shelter to the homeless.

Marni Wolf, a 25-year-old who works for a non-profit organization that puts together photo exhibits for charities, said that about 15 participants take part in the art program. She runs it with her friend Melanie Cheskes, a 27-year-old painter and social work student.

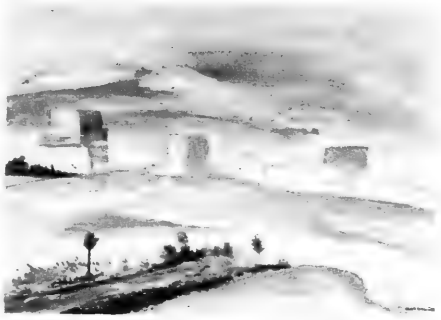
Most weeks, about 150 Out of the Cold guests, as they are referred to, show up at Beth Sholom for a hot meal, access to donated clothing, a bed and a boxed lunch for the next day, Wolf said.

The art exhibit will begin this weekend with an opening reception on Sunday (April 22) from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. It will run from April 22 to 26.

Admission is "pay what you can," and proceeds will go to the artists as well as to the Out of the Cold program. Organizers suggest a donation of $5.

Wolf said that the paintings are all "affordable." Last year, the art show's second year, paintings sold for $35 each. Prices had not yet been finalized when Wolf spoke to The CJN.

She noted that one of the artists, Winston, is no longer homeless, but still comes to paint and is planning to donate any proceeds he would receive from the sale of his art to the program.



One of the pieces painted by an Out of the Cold art program participant.

In a letter he wrote that Wolf shared, Winston described the circumstances that led to his being homeless, including a lengthy recovery from a work injury and an inability to continue paying his rent. He wrote that there is "always light at the end of the tunnel… [and] a lot of good people willing and ready to help."

In the art program, participants paint, chat and laugh together, Wolf said. "It's a really warm, comforting space for people to be creative, and they might not [otherwise] have access to those kinds of materials."

Subjects include "beautiful landscapes" and "beaches and far-away exotic places that they dream of," Wolf said.

As well, she added, "a lot paint abstract [art.] They take bright colours and put them on canvas."

Discovering unsung heroes in China

Bernie Farber
Special to The CJN

I never expected to meet a Holocaust rescuer while travelling in China last summer. Yet on a sweltering summer day in Shanghai, I was introduced to just such an unsung hero.

I learned many life's lessons from my own father, himself a Holocaust survivor. These lessons informed my life. In the 1970s and '80s as a social worker for the Children's Aid Society in Ottawa, I spent a number of years trying to protect at-risk children from the imminent dangers in their lives. Despite all my efforts, it always hurt to know that there were people around these incredibly vulnerable children who saw what was happening, but chose to do nothing.

Eventually, I moved on to a new phase in my career, becoming an advocate for Canada's Jewish community. I've spent nearly 30 years doing this work, and for most of it, I have been heartened by the will of so many Canadians to fight hate in all its forms. I've had the opportunity to work with many Holocaust survivors who inspire me through their willingness to keep fighting for a better world despite the horrors they endured.

And yet, there have also been times when I have been disappointed by the lack of action against human-rights abuses or acts of hate. It made me wonder what makes one person do nothing in the face of horror, while another will take whatever heroic, dangerous steps necessary to stop it.

I still don't have the answer. Instead, I celebrate those who do take action to make this world a better place.

I found someone new and eminently worthy to fete on my trip to China. My wife and I were there as part of a visit with our daughter . It was our good fortune that the World Expo was taking place while we were there. So we stood in long lines, sweating in 40C heat, trying to get into the country pavilions. We began in the astounding China pavilion, and slowly made our way to the small but truly Canadian Canada pavilion. But it was at the Israeli pavilion that I had my epiphany.

As I walked through the space, I noticed a small display honouring a Chinese diplomat from the late 1930s. I was intrigued by the notion that Israel would give such a place of honour to a Chinese citizen.

It turned out to be a man who should be famous the world over for his heroism. Feng Shan Ho was one of the first diplomats to save Jews by issuing them visas to escape the Nazis and the Holocaust. Appointed the Chinese consul general in Vienna months after Germany's annexation of Austria, he was repelled by the Austrians' fanatic welcome of Hitler and the country's treatment of its Jews.

When Japan occupied China in 1937, the Chinese Nationalist government retreated to Chongqing, leaving Shanghai harbour with no passport control or any authority to check documents such as visas.

That's when Ho put his ingenious plan in place. It was the perfect ploy – he provided Jews who were not allowed to leave Austria without proof of emigration a visa to Shanghai, where no one would check their papers. From there, they could find safe haven elsewhere in the world.

Despite intense pressure from his superiors to stop, he spent two years signing thousands of visas for Jews. He averaged 500 to 900 visas a month.

I was stunned. How could I have never heard of Feng Shan Ho? Israel had recognized him with the title of Righteous Among the Nations, yet Ho remained unknown even to most of those whose lives he saved with visas. That felt so wrong.

This led to months of further research. It included discussions with people such as Feng Shan Ho's daughter, Manli, whom I met in Toronto a number of months back, and Eric Goldlaub a recipient of a Ho visa that saved his life and that of his family. They all helped put texture on Ho's courage.

It also led me to understand that there were a number of other such diplomats who saved Jewish lives, very often against their countries expressed orders to refrain from doing so. Portuguese Consul Aristides de Sousa Mendes offered travel permits to desperate Jews as consul in Bordeaux France, as did Senpo Sugihara in his role as consul in Kovno, Lithuania. My cousins Israel and Sam Fishbain received visas from Sugihara allowing them to travel to Shanghai, where they survived the war.

Hiram Bingham IV was the American vice-consul in Vichy-held Marseilles and, like Sousa Mendes in Bordeaux, he handed out more than 2,500 travel visas, among them to artists Marc Chagall and Max Ernst, as well as to the family of writer Thomas Mann.

This past November, I was honoured to be part of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust Education Week, where I gave a lecture on the Shoah's unsung heroes such as Ho and others. I was slated to present it again on April 17 as part of Beth Tikvah Synagogue's adult education program.

In the Jewish tradition, it is said, "When you have no choice, mobilize the spirit of courage." Feng Shan Ho, Sugihara, de Sousa Mendes, Bingham and other Righteous Among the Nations understood that living in a time of evil, they had no choice but to act. By honouring such heroism, I hope it will also inspire other Canadians to take their own steps, big or small, to make the world a better place.

Bernie Farber is the former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Enshrining memory for all time

On the Perspectives page opposite, Michele Alperin asks how will the Jewish people recall and memorialize the Shoah without any surviving eyewitnesses? It is more an anguish than a question, tears awaiting to be shed one forlorn day in a melancholy horizon not so far away.

The crimes have already been proved and recorded. We do not need the witnesses to prove the crimes. Rather, they are, like sentinels with outstretched swords, guardians of the record. And when the last guardian is gathered to his or her people, it will fall to us, their children, and then to our children in their turn, and for all generations for all eternity, to guard the "external" record of what happened during Nazi times.

To be sure, without the sentinels at hand, the malevolent of heart will assault the record. They already do. Their most vociferous champion resides in Tehran. In truth, however, the haters of Jews denied the record even as the misshapen, mistreated, emaciated corpses in the Nazis' death camps were being tossed like so much dead wood into large burial pits for immediate, "hygienic" disposal. They always will. But as Prof. Michael Marrus told The CJN in the Perspectives essay, the record has been scrupulously recorded and stored in universities, museums and libraries by credible, honorable historians to allow no doubts concerning the intent of the murderers or the means of the murders.

The "internal" record however, is a matter for the Jewish people to enshrine in our collective memory for all time, as we have done with Jewish history for more than 4,000 years. We add to the recitations that are recorded in our holy books, captured in our folklore, ritualized in our prayers, solemnized at our memorials and told countless times by mothers and fathers to daughters and sons.

Judging by the submissions The CJN received in response to the call for original prose and poetry for our annual Passover literary supplement, the process of securing the "internal" record has indeed been internalized.

More than half of the poetry and prose we published in the April 5 literary supplement, written by old and young alike, dealt with Holocaust-related themes. More than half of all the submissions we received dealt with Holocaust-related themes.

We will teach. We will pay honour. We will remember.

In the very words of the song sung by the partisans who fought the Nazis and their helpers, we will "never say that we have travelled the last road." We will always and forever guard the record,

Mir zenen doh. Anachnu poh. Nous sommes ici. We are here.

We commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah this year on April 19.

25 years ago in The CJN

Curfews, mass arrests and closures of Arab campuses helped restore order in the West Bank over Passover, but tensions stayed high after Jewish settlers destroyed property in Arab villages and burned fields in retaliation for the firebombing of a car that killed an Israeli woman and severely burned her husband and three children.

Yom Hazikaron, 5772

We honour the members of the Israel Defence Forces who at too early an age gave their lives in defence of the State of Israel. We also honour victims of terror, including the members of the Fogel family of Itamar and the victims in Toulouse, France. We should also remember the 11 Canadian Machal volunteers who gave their lives in the 1948 War of Independence. Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion said that the "greatest contribution the Jewish Diaspora ever made to Israel was in providing the Machal volunteers." The following list of volunteers was compiled by the late Machal pilot and historian Eddy Kaplansky.

• George (Buzz) Beurling, of Verdun, Que., Canada's top World War II fighter pilot, was killed near Rome on May 20, 1948, in the crash of an airplane being readied for its ferry flight to Israel. He was buried in the Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Harvey Cohen and Ed Lugech, first cousins from Toronto, served in the Palmach Yiftach Brigade and participated in the battles of Nebi Yusha and Malkiyeh. They were missing and believed waylaid by Arab irregulars near Sarafand in June 1948.

• Reuben Schiff, of Toronto, served on the Aliyah Bet ship Paducah and was killed July 11, 1948, near Abu j'Ab while looking for his shipmate and Palmach comrade Lou Ball.

• Sidney Rubinoff, of Toronto, served with Palmach in battles of Nebi Yusha, Malkiyeh, Operation Danny, and the capture of Lydda and Ramleh. Wounded at Latrun on July 17, 1948, he died on the way to hospital.

• Sidney Leisure, of Toronto, served in 7th Brigade, 72nd Battalion, and was killed Sept. 7, 1948, during Operation Hiram in the battle for Tamra hill in the Galilee.

• Leonard Fitchett, of Vancouver, an ex-RCAF pilot, served in 103 Squadron. Downed in his Beaufighter by anti-aircraft fire on Oct. 20, 1948, while attacking Egyptian-held Iraq el Sueidan police fortress, he was buried in the Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Wilfred Canter (pilot) of Toronto, Willy Fisher (navigator) of Winnipeg and Fred Stevenson (co-pilot) of Vancouver were RCAF veterans who served in 103 Squadron. During a night supply run to Sdom, on Oct. 24, 1948, their C-47 exploded in the air after an engine caught fire. Stevenson was buried in Haifa Military Cemetery in the non-Jewish section.

• Ralph Moster (pilot), of Vancouver, was killed Dec. 7, 1948, with three others when their Grumman Widgeon crashed into the Sea of Galilee during a training flight.

Leave vengeance to a higher power

I was troubled to read that at last month's funeral for the Jewish teacher and children killed in Toulouse, France, that speaker after speaker vowed that the blood of the victims will be avenged. That statement sounds eerily like "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth," which might seem to permit reciprocal justice. It troubles me, because I wonder if people will take vengeance into their own hands.

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

We have just recounted the Exodus story over Passover, in which HaShem rather than the Israelites avenged "the blood of the victims." HaShem unleashed the 10 plagues on the Egyptians, while the Israelites moved on. This Exodus is the moral high road, the right path for wronged people broadly. The Israelites, as far as we know, got their revenge by doing better: they built their society, developed, evolved. The rest, as my Baba would say, "You leave to the Boss."

Judaism's golden rule is to treat others as you wish to be treated. Many of us used the occasion of Passover to dwell on and advocate for social justice here and worldwide. As in ancient Egypt, the answer is to develop a fair, equitable, and just society. How might we respond constructively to these killings? First, by continuing dialogue: among Jews, between Jews and non-Jews including Muslims, between Israelis and Palestinians. Resume peace negotiations between the Israeli and Palestinian governments. Discuss dismantling the Jewish settlements in the West Bank, which now house more than 300,000 Jewish Israelis. Leave any vengeance to external forces, a higher power, whatever you believe. Let us respond completely oppositely: by treating one another as we want to be treated, by living as we believe everyone should live.

Contemplating a future without survivors

Michele Alperin
JointMedia News Service

As the number of Holocaust survivors able to give direct testimony about their horrific experiences during World War II is dropping precipitously, the Jewish community must consider how the Holocaust narrative may adjust to a future where no eyewitnesses remain.

According to Hillary Kessler-Godin, of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany based in New York, about 500,000 survivors remain alive worldwide. She estimates that there were about 16,800 survivors in Canada in 2010. About 127,000 survivors are estimated to be alive in the United States.

Speaking to these demographic realities, Jonathan Sarna, professor of American Jewish history at Brandeis University, said, "As I tell my students, they are really the last generation that will be able to say they personally knew individuals who experienced the Shoah."

As scholars and educators consider a future without survivors, some focus on preserving the literal memory of the Holocaust as both a sacred obligation to the victims and an educational tool for ensuring "Never again." Others suggest that more effective ways to remember the tragedy will be new ritualized commemorations and even Holocaust fiction.

According to Sarna, the next generation of students will learn about the Holocaust through "received" rather than "perceived" wisdom. Since received wisdom is much more challenging to use in a commemorative event, the future will place new demands on the Jewish community. "I think what will need to happen is to somehow ritualize the commemoration of the Shoah the way we ritualize the commemoration of the destruction of the Second Temple," Sarna said.

As the generation now coming of age moves beyond simply hearing testimony to creating new ways to mark the Holocaust and keep it meaningful, Sarna suggests that new commemorations will have to evoke multiple meanings, as does the Passover seder – with lessons ranging from man's inhumanity to man to the importance of the State of Israel, as well as lessons of courage, resistance and the strength of the human spirit.

At the same time, the messages to young people need to be balanced if they are not to invoke what is termed "Holocaust fatigue."

"I'm sure we do not want to teach young Jews that the only reason to be Jewish is because people want to kill and destroy Jews and… because we don't want to give posthumous victories to Hitler," Sarna said. "Nevertheless, I think it would be disastrous for humanity if we allowed the memory of the Shoah to dissipate. Our job is to keep the memory fresh and to ensure that these lessons are learned anew in every generation."

For Jewish educators and museum professionals, the focus remains on survivor testimony. Diane Saltzman, director of survivor affairs at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, suggests that the survivors – as eyewitnesses –remain our best teachers. "While we are fortunate to still have them, we are trying to document from them as much as possible about their experiences," she said. "What they provide is something no one else can provide."

Prof. Sara Horowitz, the director of the Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, said that "the presence of Holocaust survivors has been fundamental to our understanding – to the extent that one can understand it – the horrifying fate of the murdered Jews of Europe under Nazism. Filmmaker Claude Lanzmann referred to them as 'living documents.'

"As witnesses to the past, survivors have a unique and irreplaceable role in conveying not only what happened during those dark years, but – even more importantly – depicting the human toll of those events. As relatives and friends of the victims, they restore to us the human faces of the millions who did not survive. There is no substitute for those voices," Horowitz said.

"We are fortunate in that many Holocaust survivors have consciously and deliberately made a stake in the future. Several important testimony projects have made it possible for thousands of Holocaust survivors to record their memories, making their faces and voices available for future generations. Survivors have written powerful memoirs. I see in my classes how powerfully these speak to students.

"Ultimately, I think that art, especially literature, will come to play an increasingly significant role in helping later generations [understand] the impact and implications of the Holocaust, not only on those who experienced it personally, but on all of us. Already in the ghettos, gifted writers expended considerable energy and scarce resources to write fiction, poetry, drama. After the war, some survivors continued to develop the literature of destruction, and their work continues to speak powerfully," Horowitz continued.

"And writers who were in a safer place during the war, or who were born later, but who regard the Holocaust as the most significant event of our culture – and by that I mean both Jewish culture and western culture – have placed it at the centre of their writing, probing its lasting effects on all of us. If we look ahead not merely decades but centuries, I think this will become increasingly important to keeping the Holocaust in deep remembrance."

Prof. Eric Caplan, chair of Jewish studies and director of the Jewish teacher-training program at McGill University, said, "Something precious will be lost when there are no more living survivors of the Holocaust. But there is also great power in the video testimonies that they have made.

"I have shown multiple testimonies of this sort to students in my course on the Teaching of the Holocaust and have seen first-hand how powerful these can actually be. Jews have shown a talent for creating rituals that call to mind the great events – both positive and negative – of our history. In time, emotionally and intellectually compelling rituals will be created for commemorating the Holocaust as well, and the video testimonies that survivors have left to us will no doubt play a large role in these rituals," Caplan said.

"Six million Jews perished in the Holocaust and tens of thousands survived. It is inevitable that we can't remember such a great number of people. But if, through education, each of us can learn about 10 victims and survivors of the Holocaust, it will be enough to keep the event vivid in our minds and protect us from forgetting that real lives were affected by this tragedy."

Michael Marrus, Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Professor Emeritus of Holocaust Studies at the University of Toronto, places some reliance for the future on the integrity of the historical record and of the historians who have painstakingly chronicled the events of the Holocaust.

"When we worry about Holocaust memory in a world without Holocaust survivors, we discount the way that we apprehend the historical past. Inevitably, the Holocaust has become history. But that does not mean that its chain of transmission should be broken," Marrus said.

"Fortunately, one of the goals of Nazism was decisively frustrated – the suffering and annihilation of the Jews was never hidden from view. Survivors, together with several generations of Jews and non-Jews, have bequeathed to us a wealth of information and analysis upon which we can rely.

"Holocaust history is now an international and thriving enterprise, operating at the highest professional level. We have Holocaust-related libraries, archives, testimonies, museums, memorials, commemorative events, books, journals, conferences, symposia, university chairs, scholars, teachers, writers, curricula and artists," Marrus continued.

"To be sure, it remains to be seen what use we make of these tools. But so long as we care about how our world has come to be, and so long as we think about it rationally, we will ponder what has been bequeathed to us – not only by survivors but also by so many who have laboured to represent the Holocaust as faithfully as possible."

Rabbi Adam Scheier, spiritual leader of the Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal, said that "our ability to perpetuate the memory of the Holocaust and those who suffered and perished in it hinges on our ability to ritualize the memory.

"Although there are no surviving eyewitnesses to the revelation at Sinai or the Exodus from Egypt, both play a central role in how we think of ourselves as Jews. We achieve this not by simply telling and retelling, reading and rereading; rather, the ritualization of memory – the Passover seder, daily recitation of Shema, etc. – perpetuates the story, he said.

"Likewise, if we determine that the tragedy of the Holocaust – together with modern Jewry's ability to rise from its ashes – is to be an essential component of Jewish identity, then introducing new rituals and adapting old rituals becomes essential to ensuring the story's survival.

"Introducing a new ritual might involve establishing an interactive and educational seder to be observed on Yom Hashoah," Rabbi Scheier continued. "Adapting an old ritual might be to add prayers of Holocaust-related lamentation on Tisha b'Av. Ritualizing moments of memory ensures that the tragic impact of the Holocaust is not exacerbated by the devastating influence of forgetfulness." Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, Holocaust Remembrance Day, falls this year on April 19.

Trying to comprehend the incomprehensible

Why did they do it? Can we find a reason for the madness that was the Holocaust?

Was it because they wanted the Jews' businesses? This economic motive is often cited for the pogroms of the Middle Ages, when Crusaders were joined by local inhabitants of Rhineland towns. They blamed the Jews for their onerous taxes and wanted their debts wiped out – just kill the Jewish moneylenders, burn the records, and clear the deck.

So, too, in the 20th century when seeking a motive for the Holocaust, we look at the economic benefit when Jewish businesses were taken over by "Aryan" owners.

Why did they do it? They believed Jews had killed Christ and were still using the blood of Christian children for their Passover rituals. So was their motive religious? Jews merited death in payment for the slaughter of the son of God?

Or maybe they did it because they believed the Jews were responsible for World War I and had profited from Germany's defeat and humiliation – an almost psychological explanation for the murder of millions.

Maybe the lawyers, professors and symphony conductors agreed to look the other way because Jews stood in their path for advancement. Just agree to legislation that, in the stroke of a pen, deprived all those Jewish professors, lawyers, judges, doctors, etc., of their jobs. Motive? Professional jealousy.

Why did they do it? Why did neighbours who had lived alongside ordinary Jewish families for centuries suddenly turn them over to the Gestapo? Was it for money? For food? For their own protection from the madness and bloodlust that gripped Europe from 1933 to 1945?

Jean M. Gerber

Was Anne Frank such an enemy of the people? And what reward did her betrayers reap? Was it enough?

Why did the soldiers do it? Why did they willingly, sometimes even joyously, herd the Jews of Yaltushkiev (my father-in-law's village) and thousands of other shtetls into the forest, strip them, and then shoot them and dump their bodies in ravines like Baba Yar? Were they drunk? Or had they ceased to regard the people they murdered as human, and thus considered themselves as exterminators of vermin?

Was it, then, the super-nationalism and racism of the Nazi ideology that led such willing executioners to fantastic heights of depravity?

The guards at the camps – why did they do it? For their own perverse satisfaction? Because they were just following orders? To feed their families?

We may ask why did the Pope turn aside from the protection of Jews and denunciation of Nazi persecution? Why did he trade papal supremacy within the Catholic Church for the lives of millions? Since the reasons are still partially hidden, we cannot know (although the book Hitler's Pope goes a long way toward explaining this).

As we approach another Yom Hashoah, have we solved the mystery that created the Kingdom of Night? Was the motive economic greed? Religious bigotry? Hunger for power? Fear for one's own life? Sheer hatred of the other? The madness of one man infecting millions of others?

All of these things went into the creation of this unique 20th-century horror, a carefully crafted machine for murder that found the spark to set it off.

The one answer we know is false is that, for some metaphysical reason, we brought it on ourselves by our backsliding ways. This obscenity should forever be put to rest.

One of the many survivors who have spoken about their experiences was a woman who told her story to thousands of high school students in British Columbia. She travelled our province for years speaking to them about her life. I quote from her eulogy about her effect on the students who heard her.

"There is an incredible archive of... letters written by students who heard [her] speak... But there is also a vastly greater and even more important legacy, an invisible legacy of things not said and not done by the young people of our province and elsewhere – the racist remarks that were not made, the jokes that were not laughed at, the gangs that were not joined."

Whatever the reasons for this great tragedy in the lives of our people, and of millions of others, the legacy of survivors' personal stories remains as a testament of hope for a better tomorrow.

From whence it comes

During the month of March, we had some spectacular days. The sun shone and people walked around with smiles on their faces. Winter seemed to have fled. Perhaps because we knew the storms were around the corner, the sense of a stolen summer's day pervaded our streets. I walked to work in sandals in March!

But I also felt guilty – or rather, I felt I should feel guilty. Wasn't this a sign of impending doom? Didn't this mean global warming was really coming? Look out! The sky is falling! How could I feel so happy? But everyone seemed blissful.

Obviously, I don't seriously think we must be sombre when it's lovely outside because we see the mild weather as a harbinger of bad tidings. But it does give us pause to think about the principle involved.

Can we benefit from bad tidings? I don't think we can find good in every evil event that occurs. Certainly, I don't endorse that awful aphorism, "There's a silver lining in every cloud." There isn't. But when we do encounter some event or person who despite a negative reality displays a positive affect, or somehow causes or does good, how do we react and remember them?

In the April 5 CJN, Sheldon Kirshner wrote an interesting column about an Iraqi general. In it, he noted that Saddam Hussein was "a brutal dictator who transformed Iraq into a model police state." Saddam killed thousands of his own people and caused national and international crises. Many Iraqis and non-Iraqis, Jews and non-Jews, celebrated on the day he died. But I know of one man, a Jew, who thought differently.

Jews had lived in Iraq for more than 2,000 years. They arrived before there was an Islamic faith. Over the centuries, there were good times and bad times, during which life flourished. But the 1940s inaugurated the last phase of Iraqi Jewish life.

In 1969, on Jan. 27, 11 Jews were hung in Baghdad. Their crime was that they were Jews, suspected of having spied for Israel. They had been jailed and tortured for 10 months, then subjected to a show trial. This man was one of the defendants. All of the others were hung. He doesn't know why he was singled out and saved. But he does know who saved him – Saddam Hussein. Sometimes bad people do good things.

This man's direct experience of Saddam is of goodness, of sunlight on a March day. But for me Saddam Hussein is still pure evil. Knowing what I know of my friend, how do I present the story of Saddam Hussein?

Thus, there are times when we experience goodness in the midst of evil. How do we deal with these contradictions and contrary images? Do we remain silent, or do we try to repair the image of the evil one? Are we even allowed to enjoy the goodness amidst evil or misfortune?

Norma Baumel Joseph

In some contexts, like the summer weather in March, these questions are silly. But in others, they assume serious connotations and implications.

Before Yom Hashoah, some of these questions assume far-reaching proportions. At times of great misfortune good does emerge. Surely, we have acknowledged the Righteous Gentiles. Not all those who lived under Nazi rule accepted Nazi ideology or authority. We now know more about the sacrifices some people made to save others and help those slated for death and incarceration. There were those whose humanity dictated human responses to pure evil.

But of course their actions and reactions, which are treated as heroic, expose the immorality and inhumanity of those who went along with Nazi rules. Had they lost their humanity entirely? So how do we present the evil of humans and the goodness of the few? We say people are not all good or all bad. Usually I agree. But the Nazis were all bad. By that I mean what they did was all bad, and we judge them by the effects of their global actions.

But there were rare moments in the sun, and that's what I'm celebrating today. Not forgetfulness. Remember the criminal and immoral, but also rejoice with the decent and honest.

Don't lose the full picture.

A nuanced portrait of a dogged Nazi hunter

In his massive, highly informative and nuanced book, The Life and Times of Simon Wiesenthal (Doubleday), the Israeli journalist Tom Segev is critical of his subject, claiming the late Nazi hunter indulged in "flights of imagination" and revelled in "historical drama rather than sticking to pure fact."

Yet Segev looks up to Wiesenthal, a Holocaust survivor who founded the Jewish Documentation Center in Vienna and never flagged in his steely determination to bring Nazi war criminals to justice.

He describes Wiesenthal – who viewed Holocaust commemoration through a broad and humanistic prism – as a "tireless warrior" and a "central figure in the struggle for human rights."

Instead of memorializing the Holocaust as a Jewish event per se, he considered the murder of European Jews as a universal crime, linking the Shoah to Nazi atrocities against the Roma, the disabled and homosexuals. He also rejected the concept of collective guilt, saying that individuals should be judged on the basis of their deeds rather than their nationality

Despite his approach, Wiesenthal – whom I had the privilege of interviewing as the Waldheim affair exploded beyond the borders of Austria – focused his efforts on ferreting out Nazis who had been implicated in the killing of Jews. In particular, he played a role in the apprehension of Adolf Eichmann, Franz Stangl, Franz Murer and Karl Silberbauer.

He may have exaggerated his involvement in these seminal cases, but Wiesenthal's dedication in pursuing Nazis with blood on their hands is beyond doubt.

Born in Galicia in 1908, Wiesenthal was an engineer and architect who endured the horrors of a succession of concentration camps and three times tried to commit suicide. Liberated by the U.S. army in Mauthausen, he developed a life-long identity with the United States. And while he chose to live in Austria, his cultural and political homeland, he viewed Israel as his second home.

He and his wife, Cyla, intended to settle in Israel in 1951 after shelving a plan to move to the United States. Wiesenthal went to great lengths to prepare himself for aliyah, but Israel's unsettled state deterred him. "The reason I don't live in Israel," he wisecracked, "is that there are no Nazis or antisemites there."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

There was an element of truth in his comment. Shortly after he settled down in Linz, Adolf Hitler's favourite Austrian city, he compiled a list of some 150 Nazi war criminals. Having established his raison d'être, Wiesenthal would become the bane of their existence, working closely with the Mossad to track down these loathsome creatures.

Wiesenthal scored a thundering coup in tracing Eichmann to Argentina. According to Segev, he embellished his feat in "a cloud of mystery and fantasy." Isser Harel, the head of the Mossad, was more scathing, claiming that Wiesenthal made no contribution to Eichmann's capture. True or not, Wiesenthal helped the Israeli police and prosecution prepare their case before Eichmann's trial in Jerusalem.

As Segev suggests, Wiesenthal fought an uphill battle in his quest to indict Nazi war criminals. Austria and West Germany opened 250,000 files against such suspects, but only 10 per cent hardened into indictments and less than half of these resulted in convictions.

Wiesenthal, too, was bitterly disappointed by the Allies' attitude. U.S., British and French courts imposed death sentences on several hundred Nazi war criminals, but stopped their activities shortly after the war.

In addition, he targeted Jews who had collaborated with the Nazis, sending the files of 31 "Jewish criminals" to Yad Vashem. He believed that more Jews would have survived had Jewish councils declined to co-operate with the Nazis.

Wiesenthal established his documentation centre in 1961 with three objectives in mind: to combat antisemitism, gather evidence on the Holocaust and find and prosecute Nazi criminals. He was flooded with letters from survivors and antisemites, some of which prompted him to break into tears.

As a rule, Wiesenthal passed on incriminating documents and located witnesses rather than personally pursuing Nazi war criminals. Thanks to his initiative, six Nazi war criminals were soon arrested and an arrest warrant was issued against Otto Skorzeny, an Austrian SS officer who freed the Italian fascist leader Benito Mussolini in a daring raid.

Rightly so, Segev credits Wiesenthal with having waged a successful campaign to repeal statutes of limitations in Austria and West Germany. These edicts imposed a 20-year limit to prosecute Nazi criminals. Wiesenthal argued they compromised efforts to draw a line between the present and the past.

In fighting this battle, he enlisted the support of of a panoply of eminent Germans, including Nobel Prize laureate Werner Heisenberg and an up-and-coming priest named Joseph Alois Ratzinger, the future Pope Benedict XVI.

Wiesenthal's success in overturning the statutes was a turning point.

As Segev puts it, "From now on he was no longer seen as an amateur sleuth or as a pest running from one official to another, or from one courtroom to another, but as a personage to whom many doors were open..."

Segev explores Wiesenthal's conflict with Bruno Kreisky, Austria's Jewish chancellor in the 1970s, at length.

When Kreisky appointed several former Nazi party members to his cabinet, Wiesenthal objected. Kreisky, defending the right of former Nazis to serve in public positions if they had not been convicted of any crime, called Wiesenthal a "Jewish fascist." The feud turned nastier as Wiesenthal sued Kreisky for libel.

Simon Wiesenthal in 1995, a decade before his death

Segev shines light on Wiesenthal's testy relationship with the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles. From almost the moment of its inauguration, Wiesenthal fired off complaints. At first, he complained it was drawing donations away from his own centre. Once that problem was resolved, he claimed he was not being consulted.

Segev delves deeply into Wiesenthal's feud with the World Jewish Congress. In 1986, Kurt Waldheim, the former secretary general of the United Nations and a former officer in the German army, won Austria's presidential election. Some critics accused Waldheim of covering up his wartime record. Still others charged he was a war criminal. Wiesenthal, a conservative who had known Waldheim for years, rushed to his defence.

The World Jewish Congress was not amused. One of its top officials, Eli Rosenbaum, claimed that Wiesenthal was "a spreader of false information, a tragic figure." Wiesenthal may have succumbed to naiveté in the Waldheim affair, but his sterling record as a dogged pursuer of Nazi war criminals remains fully intact.

Toronto home to largest Jewish film festival

Since then, the annual springtime event has grown to become the largest of more than 100 Jewish film festivals around the world, according to its founder and executive director, Helen Zukerman, who started it with funds from a family foundation and a charitable number from Revenue Canada.

"At first Revenue Canada said no, because they were afraid we were going to make money," Zukerman recalled. "After we got off the floor laughing, we tried again – our lawyers kept persevering. Finally, we got permission by using words like 'education' and 'culture' and 'outreach.'"

In truth, the festival has never come close to making a profit. Last year, it sold more than 30,000 tickets but relied as usual upon a multitude of generous corporate patrons and private donors to cover most of its approximately $700,000 in operating costs.

Part of the festival's success must have to do with the fact that it is located in one of the few large Jewish communities in the Diaspora with an increasing population. Another factor must be the rising quality and quantity of Jewish-themed films that have become available, especially from Israel, over the past two decades.

This year's headliner, A Bottle in the Gaza Sea, was shot in Israel but is a French and Canadian co-production. Based on a young adult novel by French author Valerie Zenatti, it was directed by French filmmaker Thierry Binisti, a French Jew whose parents are from Algeria.

The film was shown at two festivals in Quebec in March before going into general release there. The Montreal Gazette called it "must-viewing" and "a gripping, unsentimental drama with a lot of action and a pacifist message of hope and reconciliation."

OSS177* is a comedy by the same team behind The Artist.

Montreal's EMA Films co-produced the film, which is in Hebrew, Arabic and French with English subtitles. The lead actors are Agathe Bonitzer, a Parisian who had to learn Hebrew for the part, and Mahmoud Shalaby, a Palestinian who had to learn French.

Other festival highlights include Miss Judy, a documentary that honours local Toronto hero Judy Feld Carr, who helped more than 3,000 Syrian Jews escape to freedom. The film is receiving its international première at the festival.

OSS 117: Lost in Rio is a comedy by acclaimed director and actor team Michel Hazanavicius and Jean Dujardin, who scored best-picture and best-actor Oscars this year for their work on The Artist.

A spoof of 1960s spy films, OSS 117: Lost in Rio is being screened May 6 at the Toronto Underground Cinema as part of an "outrageously funny double bill." The capper is This Is Sodom, a Monty-Pythonesque biblical farce that was the biggest Israeli box-office smash in 25 years.

Other comic fare includes Hitler: The Comedy Years, which may sound like something from the Mel Brooks school of comedy, but is actually "an intelligent British documentary" that focuses on comedians who have poked fun at the Fuhrer. Let My People Go is an offbeat French comedy about a gay Jewish man and his dysfunctional family, while Dorfman is a romantic comedy with Sara Rue and American Jewish film icon Elliott Gould.

More serious pieces includes Kafka's Last Story, a documentary that explores the mystery behind the writer's legacy and manuscripts, which, strange as it sounds, are currently being guarded by an eccentric woman and dozens of cats in Tel Aviv.

Portrait of Wally and My Best Enemy are documentaries that deal with aspects of the art world, while Cabaret-Berlin: The Wild Scene focuses on Berlin's artistic scene of the 1920s and early 1930s and the Jewish artists who contributed to it.

The festival program also includes a variety of intimate documentary profiles. Subjects include Philip Roth, Howard Fast, Tony Curtis, Art Spiegelman, Henry Kissinger and Jascha Heifetz. A.K.A. Doc Pomus is a Canadian documentary about songwriter Jerome Felder, who wrote material for Elvis Presley, Ray Charles, Andy Williams, the Drifters and others.

The Sound of Movies: Masters of the Film Score is a robust sidebar series that celebrates the music of a multitude of acclaimed film composers, including Stephen Sondheim, Alex North, Bernard Herrman, Aaron Copland, Howard Shore, Danny Elfman and David Shire.

Progressive Poles seek pluralistic nation: scholar

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The renewal of interest in Jewish culture and history in contemporary Poland is mainly rooted in a desire by liberal Poles to build a pluralistic society in their country, a Canadian sociologist says.

Genevieve Zubrzycki, a University of Michigan sociologist and director of its Polish studies program, said this interest cuts across various lines.

"It's hip to be Jewish in Poland," she declared.

This phenomenon manifests itself in the opening of new museums and memorials dedicated to Jews, the popularity of klezmer music, the proliferation of Jewish cultural festivals, Judaica bookstores and Jewish-cuisine restaurants and the increase in Holocaust tourism.

It is also evident in the emergence of Jewish studies programs at universities and the engagement of Polish artists and intellectuals with Poland's Jewish past and in Polish-Jewish relations.

Zubrzycki, a Québécois whose ancestors include a Polish grandfather, delivered her comments earlier this month at a University of Toronto forum sponsored by the Centre for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies and co-sponsored by the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Chair in Holocaust Studies and the Centre for Jewish Studies.

Genevieve Zubrzycki

Her speech was titled "Stretching the Symbolic Boundaries of the Nation: Jewish Renaissance and Philo-Semitism in Contemporary Poland."

Zubrzycki, who has carried out extensive ethnographic fieldwork in Poland, suggested that her topic is really about the politics of memory and identity.

Prior to World War II, she noted, Poland was a multiculturally diverse nation of minorities, with ethnic Poles, Jews, Germans, Ukrainians, Tatars and others comprising its polyglot population.

According to the 1931 census, 65 per cent of its citizens were ethnic Poles. But with the redrawing of Poland's borders after World War II, Poland became one of the world's most ethnically homogenous countries.

Today, 96 per cent of people living in Poland are ethnic Poles, while only 5,000 to 25,000 are Jewish, compared to three million in 1939, said Zubrzycki, whose last published book was The Crosses of Auschwitz: Nationalism and Religion in Post-Communist Poland (University of Chicago Press).

Since the collapse of Communism in the late 1980s, pluralism has been hotly debated in Poland, she said.

The Communist regime worked to create a homogeneous Polish society, which, ironically, was the objective of right-wing Poles and the Catholic Church, long the repository of Polish nationalism.

During this four-decade period, the historical Jewish presence in Poland was considered virtually a taboo subject.

But after Communism was swept away and replaced by liberal democracy, Poles, particularly young, progressive Poles who value tolerance and diversity, began delving into Poland's Jewish dimension.

Conservative, older Poles, on the other hand, continue to regard the concept of Polishness through the prism of ethnicity and Catholicism and associate Jews with the contagion of cosmopolitanism and liberalism, Zubrzycki said.

Poles who seek to build a pluralistic Poland present the Nazi mass murder of Jews during the Holocaust as a "tragic loss" for Poland.

They want Poland to revert to its "true essence" as a tolerant, open, heterogeneous, multicultural nation.

As well, they want to stretch the definition of Polishness to make it more inclusive.

Such Poles believe that Jews bring "colour" to Poland's present monocultural landscape," she said.

In a reference to antisemitism, Zubrzycki said their campaign to resurrect a multicultural Poland is also a function of a wish to exorcise "the demons of the past."

Speaking of current projects by artists to promote a pluralistic Poland, Zubrzycki mentioned several, including "I Miss you, Jew" and "Poland for All."

These projects are designed to reclaim and revive the memory of Poland's pre-war Jewish community, combat antisemitism, break the boredom of ethnic "sameness" and save Poland from the grasp of right-wing nationalists.

It is difficult to know what proportion of Poles are in agreement with the goal of grafting diversity onto Poland, she acknowledged.

But this vision is primarily supported by young Poles and is gaining traction, she added. She praised the Krakow Jewish Cultural Festival as a model of its kind, saying more than a dozen cities In Poland have established such festivals since the 1990s.

According to Zubrzycki, they are indicative of the fascination Jews exert on some Poles in modern Poland.

Isaac Osiel, the incoming president of Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation, kicked off his presidency with a surprise party that left the shul's rabbi in tears and a congregation feeling united.

Rabbi Yoseph Oziel (no relation) not only celebrated his 40th birthday last month but also marked his 15th anniversary as leader of the 300-member shul.

Osiel said he worked under the rabbi's nose for three months to organize a surprise party for him with 200 of the rabbi's closest friends and congregants.

"The challenge for the surprise party was getting the rabbi to the building. Seeing all the cars, the people, right away he would know something was up," Osiel said.

On March 25, Rabbi Oziel was told to come to the synagogue for a "meet-the-board night," since a new board had just been elected.

"He was totally taken aback. He had no idea."

Speaking to The CJN about a week after the surprise party, the rabbi still had trouble expressing just how surprised, shocked and emotional the event had left him.

"I was moved to tears several times… It was just surreal and it was very emotional. It took me a few minutes to compose myself. I remember vaguely everyone coming from all directions to say something to me," he said.

Isaac Osiel, Petah Tikva's incoming president and Rabbi Yoseph Oziel.

"I caught a glimpse of my mother, and it took me a few moments to register that – and my brother, who came in with her from Montreal. My mother-in-law also came in from Montreal.

"It was disturbing how well my wife kept this secret from me," Rabbi Oziel added with a laugh.

Osiel said during the planning stages, he asked the congregants to e-mail pictures of themselves with the rabbi for a slide show, and he also organized a video tribute that featured well-wishes from his friends all over the world.

The night ended with Danny Soberano, the outgoing president who sponsored the dinner, presenting Rabbi Oziel with the ultimate birthday gift.

Soberano and four other Petah Tikva members chipped in to buy the rabbi a brand-new Kia Sportage.

"Generous is not the word," said the rabbi who felt he couldn't properly convey his gratitude.

Osiel said that while the surprise party, which was a members-only event, was meant to honour the well-loved rabbi, it was also an opportunity to reinforce a feeling of community.

"It really felt like one family coming together to celebrate," he said.

"What made this extremely special was the fact that these were 200 people or so who wanted to be there. It wasn't a synagogue function – it was an opportunity to come out – and every person who was there wanted to be there," the rabbi added.

"Looking around the room, I saw so many people and each person means something different to me, something unique to me. I don't have superficial, generic relationships with the people in our community. Because of our history, 15 years already, I've had opportunities to share personal moments and to make very personal and individual relationships."

Looking past the high of the surprise party, both Osiel and the rabbi couldn't contain their optimism about the future of the Sephardi Jewish community in Toronto.

Osiel, a 35-year-old father of five daughters, is one of the youngest presidents in Petah Tikva's nearly 40-year history.

"I'm the first Canadian-born president, signifying a change of the generation," he said.

Ten years ago, a number of Jewish organizations commissioned surveys and studies that tried to predict how the next generation of Jews would connect to the community their parents had built.

Many leaders of the organized Jewish world worried that young Jews – who voiced their desire for initiatives that offered something new and different – would be largely disengaged and unaffiliated.

Osiel, who paid his dues as the shul's vice-president for the past five years, said he is an example of a young Jew who is working to shape his community into what he wants it to be.

"People say I may be young to be doing this, but it's been a progression for me and this was the next natural step for me to take," he said.

"I've been volunteering there since I was bar mitzvah. I was the director of the camp at one point… at 15 I was running a baseball league, and then we started a hockey league, and that's been 19 years."

Rabbi Oziel said his new president "is one of the most dynamic young leaders in our community," and he's excited to be working with him.

"We have already sat for hours talking and exchanging ideas," the rabbi said.

"I really want to make this place an environment that people want to be a part of, something that attracts young people, something that attracts members to come more often and engage them in different programming," Osiel said, adding that he'd like to develop a Shabbat program for children.

"I recognize that our membership is big, and we have many members who pay $1,100 and come twice a year… I don't understand members at any synagogue who pay thousands of dollars and come twice a year. I feel like I have to give them value."

Osiel isn't the only young Jewish professional working to influence the next generation of Sephardi Jews.

Adding some more young blood to the shul's board is Jack Benarroch, 30, who is taking over as Petah Tikva's vice-president, and Ariel Oziel (Isaac's cousin), 30, who will serve as the shul's treasurer.

Rabbi Oziel said that having a new generation of Jews occupy the board is "a dream come true.

"This is what we've been dreaming about when we had our Shabbatons and our youth minyans… We always looked forward to the day when these young people would take over and we're living the dream now."

A lifelong love affair with summer camp results in a remarkable gift

The Pat and Jack Kay Centre Camp readies for an unforgettable summer

By Daniel Horowitz

As one of the youngest campers to ever take to the cabins of Winnipeg's Camp B'nai Brith and Camp Massad some 63 years ago, Jack Kay was bitten by the camping bug earlier than most.

His career as an overnight camper began at the age of eight, followed by his turn as a Counselor in Training (CIT), and finally, a counselor.

Today, Jack, 71, along with wife Pat, is taking his ongoing love affair with Jewish camp to a whole new level, and Jewish youngsters across the Greater Toronto Area will reap the benefits with a Jewish summer camp experience they will remember for a lifetime.

The Toronto couple recently made a remarkable $5 million gift to UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign and as a result, The Jack and Pat Kay Centre Camp, the largest Jewish Day Camp in the GTA, is set to deliver a summer like no other.

The Kay's gift will benefit the two current locations of Centre Camp - one on Glenview Campus, and its newest location on Vaughan's Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Centre - as well as any future sites.

The Jack and Pat Kay Centre Camp is an initiative of the Prosserman JCC on Sherman Campus and York Region's Schwartz/Reisman Centre.

"For Pat and myself, this is all about supporting those who need a helping hand; it's that simple," says Jack, the President of Apotex who decided to get involved with Centre Camp and the Sherman Campus after his friend and colleague, CEO of Apotex, Barry Sherman along with his wife, Honey, gave a gift to the Tomorrow Campaign, creating Sherman Campus.

Pat and Jack Kay

"Barry and I have very similar goals," explained Jack who avoids the spotlight, but agreed to be interviewed in the hopes that it would inspire others to give. "Once he and Honey made their gift to the Tomorrow Campaign, I told him that we would be happy to support Sherman Campus, too. And, with the Prosserman JCC there, and with my love for summer camp, it was a perfect fit. Barry and I are both proud of our Jewish heritage, and the Jewish culture. We are proud to represent – through our philanthropic giving – important Jewish values such as tikkun olam and tzedakah."

And, when it comes to giving back, Jack does more than just talk the talk. In fact, he is also chairing the fundraising committee for the new Humber River Regional Hospital being built in Toronto's Jane and Finch Corridor, one of this city's most economically depressed areas.

"We all have an obligation to give to those who are less fortunate," he says. "Let's face it; you can't take it with you, so we need to help others. I want to make sure that, with our gift to Centre Camp, the camp is sustainable and that Jewish youngsters enjoy the camping experience because I can personally attest to how it provides an important foundation for their Jewish lives. The only reason Pat and I let the camp use our names is because we have a Foundation, and we wanted our children and grandchildren to learn about, and understand, their responsibility of tzedakah and to do what's right, because one day, they will administer the funds in that foundation."

"Our camp family is greatly appreciative of the Kay's generous donation," said Phil Faibish, Director of The Jack and Pat Kay Centre Camp. "We are committed to ensuring that every child has the opportunity to benefit from a Jewish camping experience and we are looking forward to many memorable summers at our Sherman and Lebovic campuses."

Jack, who along with Pat, are fitness buffs and workout at least three times a week, knows full well the importance of a Jewish summer camp experience.

"Let's put it this way," says Jack. "It's been over 60 years since I was a camper in Winnipeg, but I still remember the fun, the excitement and the experiences I had. It made such a strong and important impression in my life. I even remember some of the great friendships I made back then. And, it's funny, it may have been more than 60 years ago, but it still feels like it was only yesterday."

"Our Jewish Community Reads!" with the help of UJA Federation's Itanu Toronto

Jews are known as "The People of the Book", so, really, it should come as no great surprise that an exciting new UJA Federation of Greater Toronto initiative called Our Jewish Community Reads! is underway.

A project of Itanu Toronto - UJA Federation's Inclusion Initiative - Our Jewish Community Reads! was created to encourage all members of Jewish Toronto to become passionate about reading, while highlighting various social issues. This year's reading theme is about promoting the importance of being a truly inclusive Jewish community.

Itanu Toronto, chaired by Stan Kugelmass, is passionate about living in a community in which people with special needs and disabilities are able to fully participate in community life, and are treated with respect, dignity and equality.

On Thursday, May 10, 2012, at 7:00 pm, Itanu Toronto will be holding a unique event in the Tamari Hall at the Lipa Green Centre (4600 Bathurst Street) featuring author Rachel Simon who will speak about her recent book, The Story of Beautiful Girl, a New York Times bestseller. The book, a poignant and moving love story about the seemingly impossible odds faced by a couple with disabilities and a lost child, explores empathy and tolerance in a unique and unforgettable way.

A book signing and a wine and cheese reception will follow.

"What an honor it is to have Jewish Toronto - one of the strongest champions of inclusion in North America - invite me to Canada," said Simon. "Not only do they have a vision of community that truly embraces everyone, they are passionately and thoroughly committed to making that vision a reality. Jewish Toronto is the advocate the people in my books could only dream of. Thank goodness they are here, making that dream come true."

Organizers are also planning to host a day-time program with Simon at The Schwartz/Reisman Centre on Vaughan's Lebovic Campus, created especially for service providers who work with special needs clients.

Rachel Simon

"We have made considerable strides since the time that this story takes place in transforming physical environments that acted as barriers between different populations," explains Itanu Toronto member, Rhona Shulman. "We have closed institutions, mainstreamed students, legislated accessibility and implemented customer service standards. Now we must focus on the human dimension by creating and embracing inclusive relationships where all individuals, no matter how different, are respected, welcomed and engaged meaningfully in our community. Rachel Simon in her personal life and as an author shows us how to do just that."

The event featuring Rachel Simon is sponsored by Itanu Toronto. Co-sponsors include Indigo Books, the Miles Nadal JCC, The Prosserman JCC, Schwartz/Reisman Centre, Koffler Centre, PJ Library, UJA Federation's Centre for Jewish Education, Reena, Jewish Family & Child, JVS Toronto, JIAS Toronto and Chai Tikvah. For more information and to register for the Rachel Simon event, please contact Anna Fanizza at 416-635-2883 x 5263, or at inclusion@ujafed.org

Reflecting on tragedy

Rabbi Moshe Stern

Sitting at the Pesach seder and reciting the words "B'chol dor vador, omdim alaynu l'chalotaynu,"- "In every generation, they rise against us to destroy us." I couldn't not help thinking about the rabbi and three children mercilessly murdered at their Jewish school in France. Will this hatred ever cease?

Yom Hashoah is upon us again, and rather than simply going through the motions of lighting candles and reciting poems, I believe we need to reflect on what we can do to usher in a new messianic age, free of hate and where Israel will find peace and serenity. How can we achieve this utopia?

The Ben Ish Chai traces the devastating effect of sinat chimam – senseless hatred among ourselves – to biblical history, which we re-enact at the seder.

The third of the four questions in the Hagaddah asks: "On all nights of the year, we do not dip food even once – but on Pesach night, we dip twice." This refers to dipping vegetables in salt water (karpas) and maror (bitter herbs) in charoset (mixture of wine, nuts, etc.).

The Ben Ish Chai says these two dippings remind us of the first two dippings in Jewish history.

The first evokes the story of the desire of Jacob's sons to rid themselves of their brother, Joseph. They take his coat, dip it in the blood of a goat and present it to their father.

So the first dipping on the night of Pesach is to remind us of the horrific plague of hatred among our own brothers, which we have suffered from throughout our history.

The second dipping at the seder reminds us of the dipping of blood in a bunch of hyssop and smearing it on the doorposts of the Jews at the outset of the 10th plague.

Rabbinic Reflections

The Ben Ish Chai says it's no coincidence the Torah uses the expression agudat ayzav (a bunch of hyssop), the first word of which is derived from the word agudah – unity.

The redemptive process came about as a result of the unity of the Jewish people. This display of unity was an absolute prerequisite to redemption, because it acted as a tikkun – a collective response and correction – to the hatred the brothers exhibited toward Joseph. The dipping of the hyssop branch and dabbing the blood on the doorposts corrected the dipping of Joseph's coat.

The Ben Ish Chai concludes that if we're serious about bringing about the final redemption, we, too, must correct that symbolic dipping of Joseph's coat and bring about an era of Ahavat Yisrael, unconditional love among the entire Jewish nation.

The lingering effects of sinat chinam prevents the messianic age from happening. We'll honour the memories of the millions who were murdered in the Shoah and those murdered by Arab terrorists by kindling lights of Torah and mitzvot, and by providing affordable Jewish education and ceasing to fund projects that have little or nothing to do with preserving our Jewish heritage.

Most importantly, we must find the ability to extend our hands in the true spirit of achdut – unity – so that God will surely bless us with the final redemption.

Rabbi Moshe Stern is spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto.

Director of Congregational Learning

TEMPLE ISRAEL – OTTAWA, ONTARIO

The new position of Director of Congregational Learning will provide our Reform congregation with vibrant, cohesive and integrated programs that reach out to our members, the local Jewish community and the Ottawa community at large. The successful candidate will possess a minimum of a Bachelor's degree in Education. (A Master's degree and a specialization in Jewish learning will be considered an asset.)

The successful candidate will have experience in creating and leading programs that integrate temple, school and community life; in training and supervising teaching staff; and in delivering and evaluating programs that foster engagement and affiliation. Experience in delivering multi-faceted programming for all age groups and experience in change management will be considered assets.

Temple Israel (Ottawa) has 360 member families and is the city's only Reform Congregation. We are a vibrant Jewish community dedicated to Torah, Tzedakah and Avodah.

It is anticipated that the position will be filled by July 2012, and duties will commence no later than September 2012. Enquiries and applications should be directed to the Executive Director. Deadline for receipt of applications is midnight 31 May 2012.

Donors should trust the trustees

Poor Jim Balsillie. Over the past year or so, he has watched as the company that he led and grew into an international success story has made misstep after misstep. Research in Motion has lost 90 per cent of its value amid a feeling it can no longer compete with Apple or Google.

Forced out of RIM, Balsillie, one of Canada's greatest philanthropists, can't even give his money away. This month, York University's faculty recently voted to reject a $30 million donation from his Centre for International Governance. The school claimed the donation came with too many strings attached, including veto power over some faculty appointments. For the university world, in which academic freedom is sacrosanct, such conditions were deemed unacceptable.

It's most inspiring to see people turn down large sums of money if acceptance would jeopardize principles they hold dear. Perhaps those in the academic world, enjoying the benefit of tenure, can more readily ignore the economic fallout of turning down millions of dollars. And while one can debate whether these particular principles are correct, this most honourable display of intellectual honesty raises the interesting question of the proper relationship between donor and recipient. There's no doubt that many, and likely most, donations come with many strings attached, some overtly mentioned and other implied, at times quite strongly, even if never stated.

Jewish philanthropy, tzedakah, has traditionally been composed of two parallel tracks – public and private, corresponding to what we might call taxes and charity. Members of autonomous Jewish communities were taxed, with funds going to pay for the necessities of Jewish communal life, primarily free education for young people.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Just as governments rely on the private sector to fund many worthy causes, individual Jews were expected to do the same. In the western world, where Jewish communities no longer have coercive powers of taxation, tzedakah is completely voluntary. And rabbinic authorities have generally assumed that individuals will direct their monies as they see fit. With needs and requests far outstripping the abilities of even the wealthiest of donors, choices need to be made.

We should expect donors to fund projects that align with their goals. Questions can be asked, and if the answers are unsatisfactory, donations can be directed elsewhere. And, theoretically, conditions can be made as to the use of the money. Provided that at the end of the day money is given away, one can and should give to those institutions that meet donors' stated objectives. The problem is that often the conditions are not necessarily the most appropriate, and the strings may hamper rather than help those in need.

Jewish law demands that those in charge of charitable funds be of unimpeachable character, people who command our fullest trust and confidence. It is questions of integrity, even more than policies, that should concern donors. When we're confident that our money is in good hands, we should thank God that we are blessed to be a donor and give the money with a full heart and with no strings attached. Let us trust the trustees of those funds to use them in the most appropriate manner.

Rabbi Amital's yeshiva combined army, Torah study

It is inspiring to read the stories of Holocaust survivors whose world was destroyed and who, nevertheless, went on to lead productive lives. One such survivor was Yudl Klein, born in Romania in 1924.

All of his family were sent to death camps, but he, a young healthy male, was sent to a labour camp and survived. After liberation, Yudl made it to pre-state Israel and fought in the War of Independence in 1948-1949.

Like many new arrivals in Israel, Yudl took on a modern Israeli name: Yehuda Amital. He grew up to be one of the most widely respected rabbis in Israel, a beloved rosh yeshiva. The yeshiva that he founded, Yeshivat Har Etzion, was one of the first on the hesder model, combining army service with intense Torah study. Rabbi Amital worked there from its founding in 1968 until his death in 2010. It remains one of the most respected yeshivot in Israel.

Most rashei yeshiva live a cloistered life, surrounded by books and students. Not so Rabbi Amital, who was a true public intellectual, friendly with leading secular Israeli writers, thinkers and politicians, and often quoted in the secular Israeli press. He even ventured into politics, serving as minister without portfolio in the short-lived cabinet put together by prime minister Shimon Peres after the assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995.

Eliashiv Reichner, a religious Israeli journalist, came out with a biography of Rabbi Amital in 2008 and updated it after Rabbi Amital's death in 2010. The updated version has now been translated into English, by Rabbi Elli Fischer, under the title By Faith Alone: The Story of Rabbi Yehuda Amital. Rabbi Fischer is a seasoned translator, expert in Judaica and in Israeli politics. He skilfully makes even detailed descriptions of issues in halachah and the always complicated machinations of Israeli politics intelligible to the lay reader of English.

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, Rabbi Amital was one of the leading religious proponents of a dovish position on Israeli politics. He argued that, in the scale of Jewish priorities, the people of Israel should outrank the Land of Israel. Accordingly, territorial compromise with the Palestinians was desirable if it would improve the peace and tranquility of Jews in the Jewish state. The book shows that Rabbi Amital was actually a rather complex character who may have evolved over time into the man known as a relative leftist.

I was intrigued by the story of the establishment of his yeshiva. It is located in Gush Etzion, an area just south of Jerusalem where, before 1948, there were a few small religious Jewish communities surrounded by Arab communities. During the War of Independence, these Jewish communities were in grave danger. Women and children were evacuated, but the men stayed to defend their homes. They were overrun and massacred. When the armistice ("Green") line was drawn in 1949, Gush Etzion was outside of it, under Jordanian control.

Views & Reviews

From 1949 until 1967 Jews, particularly those who had been evacuated, longed to return to Gush Etzion. There was no place inside the Green Line from which they could see their former homes. But just one hill over from Kfar Etzion, the main Jewish community that had been razed, there was a lone oak tree at the top of a hill, visible even from within the Green Line.

In the Six Day War, Israel recaptured Gush Etzion. Kfar Etzion was one of the first "settlements" beyond the Green Line, rebuilt by Jews, including some of the by-now grown children who had been evacuated in 1948. Yeshivat Har Etzion was first set up inside this new/old kibbutz. But the yeshiva needed its own home. After a year or two, the yeshiva moved not for away, to the hill with the lone oak tree. The community surrounding the yeshiva was (and still is) named Alon Shevut ("the Oak of Return," a play on a phrase in Genesis 35:8).

The story is moving and well-known. But what I learned from this book is that the "return" of Jews to the hill of Alon Shevut was much more controversial than their return to Kfar Etzion. Jews had never (at least in modern times) lived on the hill of Alon Shevut. The site had deep symbolic meaning, but Jews could not build there unless the Israeli government expropriated the land from its Arab owners. The government hesitated to do so, but Rabbi Amital was one of the primary people who urged the government to establish his yeshiva there.

I also learned from this book that in those crucial years right after the Six Day War many people believed that Rabbi Amital was a proponent of a Gush Emunim (Bloc of the Faithful) worldview that opposed all territorial compromise – not on security grounds but simply because all of Eretz Yisrael should be under Jewish sovereignty. Many say that his shift to the left began when many of his yeshiva students were killed in uniform in the 1973 Yom Kippur War, losses that affected him deeply. He became publically perceived as a dove in 1982 when he broke ranks with most rabbis and spoke out strongly against the Sabra and Shatila massacre and criticized the hesitation of many Israelis, including prime minister Menachem Begin, to set up a commission of inquiry. In later years, Rabbi Amital would argue that his apparent metamorphosis had not been so radical.

The secular Israeli poet Abba Kovner, also a survivor, once appeared with Rabbi Amital on a television show discussing the Holocaust. Kovner asked him how he could continue to believe in God after the Holocaust. Rabbi Amital asked Kovner how he could continue to believe in man. "I believe in God," Rabbi Amital told Kovner, "but I don't understand Him. But we're supposed to understand man."

Rabbi Amital was a true leader of our generation. He taught Torah to thousands of students. He broke the stranglehold that Gush Emunim ideology had had on the modern Orthodox in Israel (and he often paid a price for his outspoken views). Most of all he taught his students that yeshiva studies are compatible with involvement in the wider world.

German poet just doesn't get it

Earlier this month, Germany's most famous author, Gunter Grass, published a poem in the leftist Munich newspaper Süddeutsche Zeitung that created an international storm.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Under the title What must be said, Grass claimed that Israel is a threat to world peace and is prepared for a nuclear first strike against Iran that would annihilate the Iranian people.

The April 12 CJN editorial (aptly titled "What must be said") rebutted Grass and pointed out that the famous German writer was soundly criticized at home by political leaders and literary critics. Indeed, Grass was similarly rebuked by leading journalists in Germany, though he did have some defenders.

In the New Republic, historian Jeffrey Herf discussed Grass' obliviousness to the essential fact that it's Iran that has repeatedly threatened to annihilate Israel, not the other way around. By making Iran appear the potential victim of Israeli nuclear aggression, abetted by Germany's supplying Israel with submarines, Grass had egregiously inverted reality including, foremost, cause and effect.

But Herf went further. Translating part of the poem, he cited a passage in which Grass attempts to inoculate himself from the charge of antisemitism by raising it as a predictable slander for daring to say "what must be said" about Israel. If anything, Grass argued, he's demonstrating courage by speaking up – as if condemning Israel were a rare phenomenon.

This is yet another dimension of Grass' delusion, but it's one shared by other detractors of Israel, who often try to pre-empt criticism of their own positions by claiming that they're struggling against those who suppress the truth.

Herf sharply dismissed this nonsense. "The idea, put forward by Grass, that there is a taboo in German intellectual and political life about criticizing Israel and its policies has been a favourite theme of Israel's critics since the 1960s. On the contrary, hostility to both Israel and the United States, and the view that these two countries are the major threat to world peace, became embedded in the German left-wing and left-liberal mainstream many decades ago. In this sense, Grass' diatribe is part of a long established conventional wisdom. It takes neither courage nor intelligence to run with the mob."

The German-Jewish historian Michael Wolffsohn has followed Grass' writings closely over the years, including his 2006 autobiography Peeling the Onion. In that book, Grass revealed, 62 years after the fact, that at 17 he had joined the Waffen SS. In a Der Spiegel interview, Wolffsohn pulled no punches about this latest controversy: "It would have fit well in the [German far-right weekly] National Zeitung – and I mean that with no ifs or buts. In the poem, Grass makes the victims into perpetrators, and otherwise it contains pretty much every other antisemitic stereotype that we know from the far-right scene." Wolffsohn noted he's not one to bandy about the term "antisemitism," but that in this case "what Grass has written is an antisemitic pamphlet compressed into pseudo-poetry."

The international criticism falling on Grass almost came to a sudden halt when attention was distracted by the Israeli Interior Ministry's decision to declare Grass "persona non grata," thus barring him from Israel. In the eyes of many, Grass was seen as a victim of an emotional overreaction by the Israeli government. Alan Dershowitz, for one, said (in a piece in the Huffington Post) that this move was unbefitting of democracy, which should only ban people who are security risks. Dershowitz argued that as reprehensible as Grass' views are about Israel, the proper way to respond to him is through argument.

On that note, the last word should go to Anshel Pfeffer, who noted in Ha'aretz that rational discourse will have no impact on the likes of Grass: "Logic and reason are useless when a highly intelligent man, a Nobel laureate no less, does not understand that his membership in an organization that planned and carried out the wholesale genocide of millions of Jews disqualifies him from criticizing the descendants of those Jews for developing a weapon of last resort that is the insurance policy against someone finishing the job his organization began."

Correction

There was incorrect information in the article "Italian honoured as Righteous Gentile" (April 5). Mary Siklos, who works at the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, is not a Holocaust survivor. Her late mother, Aniko Konigsberg, who was rescued by Giorgio Perlasca, was a survivor. In the film that was screened at the event, Konigsberg is speaking, not Siklos, as the article stated. In reference to the number of Hungarian Jews saved by Perlasca, authorities differ. The number is generally agreed to be between 3,000 and 5,000. Yad Vashem suggests it was 3,000. The CJN regrets the errors.

Pianist explores Hatikvah's origins

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Pianist Astrith Baltsan spent eight years doing research on the history of Hatikvah, Israel's national anthem, which became the basis of a book and a musical performance.

Baltsan, who will be touring the United States with her Hatikvah performance, will stop in Toronto at the Glenn Gould Studio on May 6, in honour of Israel's Independence Day.

Hosted by the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation, the show will support the rebuilding of a park and playground near the Carmel forest in northern Israel, the site of a 2010 fire in which 44 people died and more than 12,000 acres of forest were destroyed.

Baltsan, 55, was born in Tel Aviv, where she studied piano and musicology at Tel Aviv University. She received a scholarship to pursue graduate studies at the Julliard School in New York and completed her doctorate in piano performance at the Manhattan School of Music. She has been an artist-in-residence at the Banff Centre for the Arts in Alberta.

In 1986, she returned to Israel. She became interested in the origin of Hatikvah when a scandal arose because many Israeli children did not know the words or origin of the Israeli national anthem. The Israeli Ministry of Culture and Education commissioned Baltsan to research the origin and meaning of Hatikvah. Her research surprised her. She discovered that the words of Hatikvah were written by Naftali Herz Imber in Romania in 1878, using some biblical expressions. In 1882, during the first wave of Israeli immigration, Imber came to Israel.

"He visited Rishon Lezion, Rehovot, Gedera, Yessod Hamaala – and sold them again and again that same one anthem. To this day, each settlement claims that the national anthem was written just for them," said Baltsan.

When the poem reached Shmuel Cohen, a young immigrant from Romania, he adapted an ancient Sephardi melody to the first stanza and an Ashkenazi melody to the second stanza of the poem. The song then spread across the Jewish Diaspora. Baltsan discovered that the melody for Hatikvah was used throughout Europe in works by famous composers such as Gasparo Zannetti, Mozart and Bedjic Smetana.

Hatikvah became the official Israeli anthem more than 120 years after it was first written. As a result of her research, Baltsan wrote a book called Hatikvah: A Hymn Is Born and presented it to the Israeli Ministry of Education.

"By the end of my presentation, everyone got up to sing Hatikvah and I saw the minister with tears in his eyes," Baltsan said. "It made me understand that this is not only a book but a performance."

Baltsan's multimedia Hatikvah performance is a 90-minute presentation that explores the origins of Hatikvah and includes music by Mozart, Chopin, Smetana, Jewish and Israeli folk, pop and rock tunes and rare historical recordings and video clips.

"I've reached far more people than I ever thought I could reach because [the story of Hatikvah] is relevant to everybody – to every Jew in the world," Baltsan said. "In a way, this Hatikvah was also my hope to reach out to a wider range of people who want to know more about their roots."

She said that "it's very important to know why this land, this people, this nation survived – which is expressed in our national anthem. I'm lucky enough to get to show these truths, through one tiny motif – a one-minute song."

Lisa Gardner Plant, executive director of the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation, said that the committee's "assistant director in Haifa saw Astrith perform and called the next day to say that everyone in Israel is raving about her show, and that I had to bring her to Canada.

"The whole concept of the concert is unique," she said. "Hatikvah is a song that brings people to tears, but what do we really know about it? Do we know its history? It will be really interesting to learn where the anthem came from."

For tickets to the Hatikvah performance, at Glenn Gould Studio, contact the Roy Thomson Hall box office at 416-872-4255 and online at www.roythomson.com.

"The Diary of Anne Frank from Page to Stage"

IN JUNE OF 1942, ANNE FRANK PENNED THE FIRST ENTRY INTO THE RED CHECKERED DIARY SHE HAD JUST RECEIVED AS A GIFT FOR HER THIRTEENTH BIRTHDAY.

Now one of the world's most widely read books, Anne Frank's Diary of a Young Girl has engendered musical compositions, works of fine art, biography, fiction, poetry, dance and film. Jeffrey Shandler and Edna Nahshon will trace the transformation of the diary that Anne Frank kept for two years during World War II, until her arrest and deportation, into a posthumously published book, first issued in 1947, and the official dramatization of the diary for the Broadway stage, which debuted in 1955. These first efforts to make Anne Frank's life and work available to the public established important precedents for how millions of people approach Anne Frank.

Foremost Financial Continues to Beat Market with 8% Returns

Toronto, ON – At a time when market returns are flat, GICs are paying 1.5 to 2.5% and Canada's inflation rate is hovering around 2.8%, returns for Foremost Financial investors this year are projected to be 8%. In other words – the same average return on investment that Foremost has been delivering to clients since 2000.

Foremost Financial specializes in investing client funds into the construction of upscale residential and commercial projects in prime locations in the GTA. With average loans of $1-2 million for projects that take six to 18 months to complete, the investments are part of an overall portfolio managed by Foremost that currently tops $150 million and is projected to reach up to $200 million by the end of this year.

Foremost Financial's construction loans are placed by an experienced team of brokers averaging 20+ years. A team that takes a sophisticated, proven approach to overseeing each project, from the initial needs analysis to closely monitoring each site so that loan instalments are advanced as each phase is completed.

"We have an extremely sound business model by investing exclusively in projects in the GTA, Canada's most densely populated market, the country's most diversified economy and a place where homes and land in prime locations have always sold at a premium. And we don't see that changing for a long, long time," observes Foremost Financial broker and spokesperson Pauline Cygelfarb. "And yet, there are very few players doing what we're doing because it's so specialized. Even the banks consider it a niche market because their economic model is much more volume driven."

This combination of strong market demand for the projects Foremost finances to their depth of expertise funding and overseeing these projects helps account for why their return on investments are so dependable and why more than 95% of Foremost Financial investors are return clients. "They know we're diligent in terms of identifying and scrutinizing investment opportunities – we are able to diversify investments within a portfolio of projects – and our returns are dependable – averaging 8% per year since January 2000, including monthly interest payments. These are the qualities Foremost Financial customers have come to identify – diligent, diversified and dependable."

To learn more about Foremost Financial's investment opportunities, contact Pauline Cygelfarb at 416-488-5300 x400, or email Pauline@foremost-financial.com

As part of a tikkun olam initiative at Robbins Hebrew Academy, Grade 7 students went to the DANI house to meet and bake with participants in the DANI program, which provides programs and services to young adults with special needs to enhance their lives and Jewish identity. Soon, DANI participants will visit RHA to take part in Hebrew and music activities with the Grade 7 students. One Great Return Deserves Another

Over 95 percent of Foremost Financial clients investing in our Mortgage Investment Trusts are return clients – and some have been with us for more than 20 years.

Why? Because of an even more important return... the return on their investments. An average annual return of 8% since 2000 to be precise, outperforming the TSX, 10 Year Canada Bonds, Prime Corporate Paper and the Canadian Consumer Price Index in the process.

Much of our success has to do with our diligent approach into establishing a diversified portfolio of first mortgage investments within the GTA. But at the end of the day, it's all about dependable returns.

Teens to serve community

Five hundred Toronto-area teens will participate in an afternoon of community service on April 22.

They, along with 10,000 Jewish teens from around the world, will take part in J-Serve, the Global Day of Jewish Youth Service.

J-Serve is the Jewish service component of Youth Service America's annual Global Youth Service Day and also coincides with the fifth annual ChangeTheWorld – Ontario Youth Volunteer Challenge. The province's three-week challenge kicked off April 15 in partnership with Volunteer Canada's National Volunteer Week, Canada's largest celebration of volunteers, volunteerism and civic participation.

This year marks the third year in which Toronto-area teens will participate in the international initiative, thanks to funding by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the BBYO Panim Institute.

The Toronto project, hosted at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Wallenberg campus, from 11:30 a.m. to 5 p.m., has been coordinated by BBYO in an effort to encourage community building and connections across religious and societal lines.

"When registering at Jserve.ca, teens are asked to choose one of 16 service opportunities across the city," said Kevin Goodman, executive director at BBYO's Lake Ontario region. "The site also enables parents and community members to register as project chaperones to see first-hand the power of 500 young people eager to impact their world."

J-Serve Toronto 2012's service opportunities include the following activities.

- Tree-planting and cleanups at three Toronto parks
- Packaging books for a Frontier College literacy program
- Leading a thank-a-thon for the Jewish National Fund
- Joining DANI (which helps young adults with physical and/or cognitive challenges) participants for an Olympic day
- Preparing clothes for distribution by a clothing bank
- Participating in a political letter-writing workshop facilitated by the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, a social justice workshop facilitated by Free the Children's youth programming department, or a social-media focus group for Pencils for Kids
- Providing child care at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre
- Assembling school supply kits for families in need and making sandwiches for distribution to Toronto's homeless with Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee
- Working the phones at a Zareinu Educational Centre telethon to promote its 15th annual Moveathon

For more information, visit www.jserve.ca or contact Kevin Goodman at 416-398-2004 or kgoodman@bbyo.ca.

Diaspora is concerned

He's an enthusiastic and articulate spokesperson for the committee, which is co-chaired by agency head Natan Sharansky and includes representation from the Diaspora and Israel and from all streams of Judaism. It meets when JAFI's board of governors gathers three times a year in Israel. It also holds teleconferences and communicates electronically, Silver said.

Recently, certain events in Israel have been front and centre in the committee's deliberations.

At the last board of governors meeting, the unity committee examined the role of haredim within broader Israeli society. The discussion came shortly after news reports of haredim in Beit Shemesh spitting and yelling insults at a seven-year-old girl for dressing immodestly. That came after reports that haredim had demanded that women be segregated on buses, sidewalks and supermarket lineups.

Anti-haredi protests were followed by haredi demonstrations that turned violent. Later, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu floated the idea of dividing the city in half, one part for haredim and the other for non-haredim.

Several speakers addressed the committee on the topic, looking at the haredi desire to remain apart from the wider society.

"It was clear in the session that Diaspora communities were concerned about it and wanted to know what the Jewish Agency would do about it," Silver said.

A Canadian perspective was offered by Linda Kislowicz, CEO of Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA, who discussed the concept of "reasonable accommodation," Silver said. "I saw that some people were quite intrigued, as they were not familiar with that concept. At least there was some listening and attentiveness to it."

Silver, who served for four years as chair of JAFI's budget and finance committee, said, "The main agenda item for the last several years has been the issue of conversion."

Conversions to Judaism in Israel are conducted exclusively by the Orthodox rabbinate. The issue affects hundreds of thousands of immigrants, many from the former Soviet Union, who are not halachically Jewish. Tension has arisen between the haredim and other strands of Judaism, including more liberal Orthodoxy, over the stringency of requirements associated with conversions.

The Jewish Agency, in particular, feels a responsibility to help resolve the issue. JAFI plays a "pivotal role in bringing people to Israel and we feel an obligation to try to resolve the problems of those who work to be Jews, while respecting the expectations of as many Jews as possible," Silver stated.

"Several years ago, when there was a conversion crisis, the Jewish Agency worked with the Israeli government to establish the Ne'eman committee, [which looked] for solutions to Diaspora wishes for Conservative and Reform involvement in the conversion procedures," Silver said.

A compromise was reached in which non-Orthodox rabbis helped prepare candidates for conversions, but even that has been rejected by haredi rabbis.

"I sense that the compromise has not held," Silver said, adding that the Jewish Agency had heard many complaints that "obstructions had been put in the way of applicants."

There is a "good faith disagreement over theology," he said, and discouraging conversions has some precedent in Jewish history. But the Jewish Agency believes the best way to proceed is to "get the widest possible acceptance from the Jewish community and get the widest number of people converting under it."

That may require "a more liberal approach to halachic conversions within Orthodoxy, a more tolerant approach."

Linda Kislowicz

There are elements within Israel's Orthodox community who are promoting an alternative in which local city rabbis who are Orthodox perform conversions using less stringent standards than those required by the haredi-controlled rabbinical courts, he said.

A task force on conversions, chaired by Sharansky, is looking into the issue of conversions to bridge differences between the various strands of Judaism. For purposes of the Law of Return, JAFI has been granted exclusive rights to determine whether recognized rabbinical authorities carry out conversions outside Israel.

Silver acknowledged that Israeli lawmakers have much on their plates, including security concerns, but "the point we want to make is, don't ignore the Diaspora. If you want to be the Jewish state, keep in mind the perspective of the Jewish world.

"The point was made within the Jewish Agency and the federations [which raise funds for JAFI] that this is an issue that matters beyond the borders of Israel. We have to be listened to and influence the decision," Silver said.

JAFI, along with the Joint Distribution Committee, received funds from North American federations to allocate for initiatives that promote unity and Jewish identity. The Israel and overseas department of Jewish Federations of North America reported that in 2011, $6 million (all figures US) was allocated to community, camp and education programs of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movements in Israel.

"About another $4.9 million enabled JAFI to offer diverse Jewish experiences to both Israeli and Diaspora communities."

Among the JAFI programs supported were its "youth futures program for ultra-Orthodox," which helps disadvantaged

Ramah Canada hires new director

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Ron Polster, whose history with Camp Ramah in Canada goes back to his bar mitzvah year, when he first attended the camp, has been hired as Ramah's next director, effective June 1.

Polster, a 45-year-old father of three who is currently director of education and family programming at Beth Tzedec Congregation, was director of Jewish camping initiatives at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto from 2007 to 2011. He spent the preceding five years as director of URJ Camp George and also served as assistant director of Camp Ramah in the Berkshires from 1994 to 1997.

Ron Polster

A native of Cleveland, Ohio, Polster, who succeeds Michael Wolf as director of Ramah, has a PhD in religion from the University of Toronto and is an alumnus of the Foundation for Jewish Camp's Executive Leadership Institute.

He said that his focus this summer – aside from learning the names of some 450 campers and 150 staff members – will be on staff training, "customer service," and looking at offering more specialized programming in areas such as sports and performing arts.

"That's one of the directions in Jewish camp in the States... having the Jewish mission, but being able to cater toward a niche market," he said.

Another trend he's seen is an increase in the amount of funding required for camp fees. "There's a constant need for fundraising to make sure we cannot leave any children behind," he said.

For parents who are also paying day school tuition, the cost of summer camp – as high as $1,500 a week at Ramah – is "a challenge," Polster said.

He acknowledged "a concern in the community" that Jewish camp might become an attractive alternative to Jewish day school education because of the relatively lower cost, but he hasn't seen that happen.

"Everbody's looking for the golden ticket. I think the key is making sure there's formal and informal education. Both provide literacy and identity."

He noted also that, in Jewish schools, "the lines are blurring" between formal and experiential education. He cited school Shabbatonim geared to leadership training as one example.

"I'm just thrilled to be the director of the camp that I literally grew up at," said Polster, who – after his years as a camper – returned to Ramah as a staff member.

youths develop their academic and social skills. It is run in co-operation with federations, philanthropists and the Israeli government. And its Partnership2gether program in Mateh Yeduda-Beit Shemesh is carried out in co-operation with Washington's Jewish federation and Jewish communities in South Africa, this program reaches out to haredi Jews and offers business development courses and mentorship for women seeking to create small businesses.

In addition, JAFI runs its MASA Israel Journey, which, in partnership with the Israeli government, provides long-term Israel experience programs.

The Nativ program, a co-operative effort of JAFI, the Israeli Defence Forces and the government, educates immigrant soldiers in Jewish history and culture. It also provides a route to conversion

Can the issue of conversion and the attendant questions of who is a Jew and who is entitled to decide who is a Jew be wedges that push Diaspora Jews away from Israel?

"There are people in the Diaspora, hopefully a small number, who say, 'If the Jewish state does not recognize me,' they throw up their hands," Silver said. "That's not the perspective of the Jewish Agency."

The agency, he continued, is "a global Jewish partnership with Israel at its heart. Israel, with all its flaws, is our state, our only Jewish state, so we have to work with Israel to improve it and at the same time not abandon it for its flaws."

Funding for McGill Mideast program to end

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The McGill Middle East Program (MMEP) is facing the termination of its $1-million annual funding from the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) after 15 years.

Director and founder Jim Torczyner said the money was supposed to run out this spring, but with lobbying, the MMEP was able to get an extension for one more year to carry on its activities in Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian territories.

He is, however, confident that new funding sources will be found and the MMEP will continue. Perennially optimistic, Torczyner envisions an expanded, rather than, diminished future.

The MMEP is becoming the International Community Action Network (ICAN), giving it a new name, but a similar mission.

CIDA funding covers about half of MMEP's total budget, or 80 per cent of the costs if the Israel portion is excluded. CIDA never covered the bill for bringing Israeli students to McGill University or for setting up community service and advocacy centres in Israel, because Canada doesn't consider Israel to be a developing country.

The Israel part of the program has largely been covered by private fundraising, which Torczyner is now spending much of his time trying to further develop in Canada and internationally.

Torczyner describes ICAN as "the coming of age" of MMEP. Its co-chairs are two MMEP stalwarts, former McGill chancellor Gretta Chambers and retired Superior Court justice Herbert Marx, a former Quebec justice minister.

The new configuration makes fundraising outside Canada easier (ICAN is recognized as a charitable group for tax purposes in the United States.)

MMEP – whose full name is the McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building – was launched in 1993 and began being funded by CIDA in 1997. The centrepiece was a specially designed two-year master's program in social work, with an emphasis on learning North American-style community organizing.

Students initially came from Jordan and Israel, and included both Jews and Arabs. By the late 1990s, Palestinians were included.

The "fellows" spent one year studying at McGill and then a second year in the field establishing and leading "rights-based community action centres" in their homelands. There have been no fellows at McGill since 2007-2008, due to an earlier reduction in the CIDA grant from $1.4 million to $1 million.

McGill University social work professor Jim Torczyner, left, and Sami Al-Kilani of An-Najah National University in Nablus are planning a new future for the McGill Middle East Program.

Fifty-three students completed the program, and there are now 11 centres in poor neighbourhoods in the Middle East: five each in Israel and the West Bank, and one in Amman.

Torczyner is aiming to open five new centres over the next five years.

MMEP has nine institutional partners in the region, mainly universities and NGOs such as the Red Crescent.

The centre's staff and volunteers guide the disadvantaged in how to secure their rights – in housing, education, health care, employment and the legal system. The centres reach about 120,000 people a year.

Torczyner believes the MMEP is a casualty of the Harper government's "shortsighted" withdrawal of funding from other Canadian non-governmental organizations working in the Middle East.

"We were basically told by CIDA that the government's priorities have changed [with regard to the West Bank and Gaza], and it will be focusing on physical infrastructure projects such as courthouses in Ramallah and a forensic laboratory somewhere else," said Torczyner.

"They also said we had been funded for 15 years and that they recognize our valuable contribution, but that we should not count on getting government support forever."

In December 2007, the government made a commitment of $300 million to the Palestinian Authority over five years, mainly for projects related to security, governance and economic prosperity. But Foreign Minister John Baird reportedly dropped a reference to that aid in his speech to the UN General Assembly last September.

Although Torczyner has successfully staved off past CIDA warnings that the money was going to end, this time he is resigned that his recourses have run out.

The cutback isn't due to the MMEP's track record, Torczyner insisted, noting an independent evaluation commissioned by CIDA that said the MMEP has achieved excellent results despite political and economic instability in the region.

It continues to receive more modest support from the Quebec Ministry of International Relations and the Open Society Foundation, founded by billionaire George Soros, which promotes democracy around the world.

The "first generation" of the community centres are totally self-sufficient, the second are on their way, and the newest ones are still in the building stage, he said.

Torczyner believes the MMEP has made a practical contribution to not only bettering the lives of people, but to fostering peaceful co-existence between ordinary Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians.

It has turned former enemies into allies. One of the most notable is Sami Al-Kilani, a Palestinian poet and PLO activist who spent five years in prison in the 1980s because the Israelis considered him a security threat, although he never engaged in any violent or subversive activity.

Al-Kilani, who was born into a poor West Bank farming family, was in the first group of Palestinians at McGill in 1998-99 and founded the first MMEP centre in the Palestinian territories.

Today, at 60, he is the dean of the faculty of educational sciences at An-Najah National University in Nablus, a member of the Palestinian National Council, a founding member of the Arab non-violence movement, and an MMEP executive committee member.

The MMEP has gone a long way to alleviate the social inequities among his people that are often at the root of discontent that can translate into conflict, Al-Kilani believes.

"There is a very thin line between hope and hopelessness," he said. "If you give people hope in solving their problems, the hope will oppose this mentality of hatred and revenge. Empowering people makes them less likely to be exposed to extremism.

"Although I never supported violence and always believed in a two-state solution, my personal transformation was not easy. But I decided I could no longer be a prisoner of my pain."

Cotler slams decision to shutter rights agency

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Irwin Cotler, the Liberal critic for justice and human rights, has deplored the federal government's decision to disband the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, better known as Rights and Democracy.

The Montreal-based nonpartisan organization, established by Parliament in 1988 during the Mulroney era, has never fully recovered from the crisis within its ranks that came to light more than two years ago.

Irwin Cotler

Differing views on the Arab-Israeli conflict between certain members of the board of directors, notably its chair, University of Toronto professor Aurel Braun, and president Rémy Beauregard and other staff was at the heart of the dispute, the House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs and international development concluded in its report on the affair released in June 2010.

Beauregard died of a heart attack the night after a particularly acrimonious board meeting in January 2010. Braun objected to a staff proposal to give grants totalling $30,000 to three non-governmental organizations – two of them Palestinian and one Israeli – to monitor human rights in the aftermath of the Israeli-Hamas war in Gaza in 2008-2009.

Braun, who was appointed chair by the Harper government in 2009, believed these NGOs were anti-Israel and possibly linked to terrorism.

Other government board appointees had become the majority on the 13-member body by the time the internal battle reached a head. Rights and Democracy was supposed to have an arm's-length relationship with the government of the day.

"By closing down this important organization, a creature of Parliament and responsible to Parliament, the Harper government peremptorily undermines Canada's standing as a leader in international human rights, and our capacity for the promotion and protection of democracy around the world," said Cotler, who served as the organization's acting chair in the 1990s.

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird announced April 3 that the government would soon introduce legislation to terminate funding of Rights and Democracy. It depends on Ottawa for about 80 per cent of its budget, which was $11 million last year.

Baird said the cutback was part of the government's effort to "find efficiencies and savings" in its budget. The Foreign Affairs and International Trade Department and the Canadian International Development Agency will assume the functions performed by Rights and Democracy, he said.

The March budget did not specifically mention Rights and Democracy, but it does speak of the government's intention to "examine its participation in some international organizations to ensure that they are relevant to Canada's interests and priorities."

Cotler commented, "A budget is more than a financial statement. It is a statement of values. By doing away with a group like Rights and Democracy in budget 2012, this government demonstrates that the cause of international human rights is simply not among its priorities…

"It is troubling, indeed shocking, that the government did not even deign to propose an alternative mechanism for defending human rights and democracy worldwide."

The New Democratic Party also condemned the shutting down of Rights and Democracy. Foreign affairs critic Hélène Laverdière said that having its functions taken over by the foreign affairs department is not the right course, because the department is "increasingly politicized by this government" and does not have the resources to assume additional responsibilities.

"Conservative mismanagement ruined this once-respected organization," she said.

The House of Commons committee, which held hearings on the matter in 2010, had recommended that the board of Rights and Democracy be dismissed and that before they go, they apologize to the family of the late Beauregard for "any statements damaging his reputation." That did not happen.

Rights and Democracy was one of three Canadian organizations cited as problematic with regard to Israel by Canadian-born Bar-Ilan University professor and CJN columnist Gerald Steinberg on his NGO Monitor website. The other two, Kairos and Alternatives, lost their federal government funding in the past couple of years.

Ghetto Shul to close

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Ghetto Shul, the storefront student-run synagogue on Park Avenue, is closing at the end of this month after being open for more than a decade.

Its spiritual leader for most of its history, Rabbi Leibish Daniel Hundert, is leaving and no replacement is being sought.

The participants will for the meantime be davening at Congregation Beth Shloime, better known as the Bagg Street Shul, the oldest synagogue in continuous use in Montreal. It's located on Bagg at Clark Street in what was the heart of the prewar Jewish district.

"It's pretty hard to find someone who is able to raise $150,000 a year, is prepared to make $30,000 a year and to live downtown where there is no eruv, which is difficult when you have a young family," said Rabbi Hundert.

He and wife Dena, who has been an active partner in running the shul, have two young children.

"Basically, anyone who might have been interested in the job has been scared away by that."

With a growing family, he also found it difficult to spend as much time with students as is expected of a college rabbi.

At 34 and after leading the shul for 10 years, Rabbi Hundert is moving on to other things. He is working on a PhD in religion and Jewish studies at Concordia University and is teaching Jewish studies at McGill University.

The shul runs Friday night and Saturday services, as well as holiday services. For a number of years, there was a daily minyan. The shul has also served as a drop-in centre through the week and a popular venue for contemporary Jewish music at night. Rabbi Hundert, a saxophonist himself, conceived of turning the place into a "synagogue-bar."

"We get anywhere from 50 to 90 people at services, 90 per cent of them students. But it has been going down a bit," he said.

Rabbi Hundert has had to raise the Ghetto Shul's budget, a large part of which is the rent for its premises, since funding from Federation CJA ended in December 2009. The recession forced the federation to make broad cutbacks at the time.

Although it has been a struggle, Rabbi Hundert is happy to be leaving the Ghetto Shul without a deficit.

The money has come from a major benefit concert by Matisyahu, the then-chassidic Jewish singer at the Olympia Theatre in November 2009, as well as smaller year-round concerts at the shul, including a series during the Montreal International Jazz Festival. A number of individuals, including alumni, have been generous as well.

The concept of a downtown music venue for young Jews didn't really take off, he said. "We had about 40 people coming out to 13 or 14 concerts a year."

The Ghetto Shul, named for the Student Ghetto east of the McGill campus, opened in August 2001 and was originally located in a duplex on Lorne Crescent, nearer to the campus. The synagogue had a close relationship with Hillel from the outset, but relied financially on private donors for its founding, he said.

It was the brainchild of Tawn Friedman, then Hillel's program director, and was led by Rabbi Avi Poupko initially. They were looking for an unusual way of keeping university students engaged with Judaism by creating a "grassroots" synagogue.

By 2003, the shul was receiving almost all of its budget from the federation and Hillel, Rabbi Hundert said.

The shul had to vacate its first premises in 2007 because the number of people using it was exceeding the space's legal capacity of 50. The Park Avenue site, between Sherbrooke and Milton Streets, is a former restaurant that was considerably bigger but also more expensive.

Rabbi Hundert and the student committee that runs the shul tried a number of ventures in recent years to keep it afloat, fashioning itself as a "synagogue-bar" where traditional Judaism fused with modern culture. A Jewish Community Foundation grant paid for the musicians, but the jam session did not generate much revenue, he said.

Rabbi Leibish Hundert

Last year, a vegetarian restaurant was launched, but running a restaurant is an arduous business and the idea was abandoned.

The Bagg Street Shul has been experiencing a revival in recent years, with more young people going there. Weekly Shabbat services are held under lay leader Michael Kaplan, a retired McGill engineering professor.

His grandfather Baris Kaplan's construction company was responsible for the conversion of the former late 19th-century residence into a synagogue in 1921.

Whether there will be a legal merger "remains to be sorted out," Rabbi Hundert said. "The Ghetto Shul is a non-profit organization, recognized for charitable purposes. That may be dissolved. It's up to the students associated with it.

"But the Bagg Street Shul has been very welcoming, very accommodating."

Rabbi Hundert noted out that the McGill Chabad House is also undergoing a renewal and will meet the religious needs of some students. It has a new young director, Rabbi Shmuely Weiss, and the Peel Street centre is being renovated.

"I'm leaving feeling grateful that I had the opportunity to give something to the young Jewish community and to many individuals who were supportive of the Ghetto Shul," Rabbi Hundert said.

Gaza children's exhibit draws criticism

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A controversial exhibit of art said to be done by children in Gaza expressing hardships due to the conflict with Israel is scheduled to continue at Cinéma du Parc until May 3.

A Child's View from Gaza is sponsored by the pro-Palestinian Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME). The exhibition's planned eastern Canadian tour opened in March at the Pierre-Georges Roy Public Library in Lévis, near Quebec City.

A poster publicizing the month-long exhibition shows a drawing of a kneeling child with his arms raised as a soldier points a rifle at him.

CJPME plans to take the exhibition to Ottawa, Toronto, London, Hamilton and other Ontario cities between May and November, and then to the Maritimes next winter. The organization is soliciting donations during the tour.

CJPME describes the 26 works, plus accompanying photos, as "depicting the daily life of Gaza under siege." The art is said to have been done by children aged five to 14 as part of art therapy classes.

"A Child's View from Gaza tells a story about children who are forced to witness horrors and how they are able to make sense of their experiences through art," said CJPME president Thomas Woodley.

Cinema-goer Harold Toulch objected to the exhibition, seeing it as "deeply offensive antisemitic propaganda." He said he won't consider going back to the cinema until the exhibition is down.

"[It] did not just describe the plight of Arab children but placed the blame for their condition solely on the shoulders of the Jewish state of Israel," he e-mailed The CJN.

Cinéma du Parc owner Roland Smith responded: "It is clear the exhibition... is a powerful one [and]... contains many riveting images."

He believes the CJPME has been "careful to contextualize the drawings and photos and to provide footnotes where appropriate. "Viewers of the exhibition are reminded that the hand-drawn works are indeed children's drawings – with all this may imply – and that the photos in the exhibition are those of eyewitness photographers, including Palestinian, Israeli and international photographers. Viewers with comments are encouraged to contact CJPME directly with those comments."

Toulch wonders why the exhibition makes no mention of the fact the children of Gaza are living under a Hamas regime, an organization designated as terrorist by the Canadian government.

It also doesn't mention that this regime is "dedicated to the destruction of the Jewish state" and regularly fires rockets towards Israeli civilian populations, "often from launchers placed in or near Gaza schoolyards," Toulch said.

He added that there's no indication of Hamas' repression of women and homosexuals, either.

Cinéma du Parc was the Montreal venue for another CJPME-sponsored exhibition in early 2010 titled Human Drama in Gaza. It consisted of 44 photos taken in Gaza mainly in the aftermath of Israel's conflict with Hamas in the winter of 2008-2009. Most showed devastation and human suffering.

On the other hand, the independent cinema is the venue for the annual Festival du Cinéma Israélien de Montréal, sponsored by the Communauté Séphardade Unifiée du Québec. The seventh edition was held in March.

Author stresses positive reinforcement when dealing with health crises

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

How does one cope with multiple health crises and retain a sense of joie de vivre?

Susan Flam, who has survived a cycle of illnesses, says, "You can."

Susan Flam is the author of Choices: Lemons or Chocolates.

She wrote a book titled Choices: Lemons or Chocolates "as a cathartic journey outlining my 30-year-plus struggle with chronic illnesses and the resulting depressions," she said.

The book is really not about her, though, she says. "Everyone experiences obstacles in life, and not until you make choices on how to follow your path to a better quality of life, do you know what you are going to get. Life is like Forrest Gump's box of chocolates."

The character Forrest Gump, in the 1994 movie of the same name, says, "My momma always said, 'Life is like a box of chocolates. You never know what you're gonna get.'"

In her 109-page book published by BookCrafters, Flam tells about her self-discovery and how she survived many roadblocks, "to empower and motivate readers into believing that whatever hand they have been dealt, you have to find a positive out of it all to move forward so you can be productive and happy."

Flam, 64, a mother and grandmother, was born in Germany and immigrated to Toronto with her parents, Esther and Harry Fish, both Holocaust survivors, when she was six months old.

Flam has sprinkled her book with quotes about survival and hope from famous people, including Friedrich Nietzsche, Winston Churchill, Christopher Reeve and others.

> 'Life is like Forrest Gump's box of chocolates'

She gives her readers the opportunity to choose a way out of their misery through positive reinforcement and simple methods that work for her.

"I feel that my book contains good elements that could really make a difference in the lives of people who are looking for answers to coexist with their afflictions," Flam said.

One of her many coping tools, she says, is to remain active. Flam is a volunteer for several charitable organizations, including Beit Halochem, Na'amat and the Starlight Children's Foundation.

Choices: Lemons or Chocolate is available at the Batner Bookstore in Thornhill, Ont., and online at Amazon.com, Barnes & Noble and Smashwords.

MONTREAL — Pioneering HIV/AIDS researcher Mark Wainberg of the Jewish General Hospital's Lady Davis Institute (LDI) and McGill University has been awarded the $100,000 2012 Killam Prize in health sciences.

No 'freebie' to Iran: Obama

JTA

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama has responded to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's claim that world powers gave Iran a "freebie" by agreeing to hold more talks.

"We're going to keep on seeing if we make progress. Now, the clocking is ticking and I've been very clear to Iran and to our negotiating partners that we're not going to have these talks just drag out in a stalling process. But so far at least, we haven't given away anything," Obama said late Sunday during a news conference in Cartagena, Colombia.

"The notion that somehow we've given something away or a 'freebie' would indicate Iran has gotten something. In fact, they've got some of the toughest sanctions that they're going to be facing coming up in just a few months if they don't take advantage of these talks," Obama added.

Talks between Iran and the six world powers – the United States, Britain, France, China, Russia, and Germany – about Iran's nuclear program resumed April 14 after more than a year's hiatus. The sides agreed to meet again on May 23 in Baghdad.

"My initial impression is that Iran has been given a freebie. It's got five weeks to continue enrichment without any limitation, any inhibition," Netanyahu said Sunday in Israel.

Iran says its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but the western world fears that Iran may be enriching uranium in order to produce a nuclear bomb. Netanyahu has called on the international community to halt Iran's nuclear production by force if necessary, and has warned that the window in which to prevent Iran's production of a nuclear bomb is rapidly closing.

U.S. President Barack Obama

In related news, a dozen Iranian nuclear experts visited North Korea last week to observe its failed rocket launch on Friday, South Korean state news agency Yonhap's Washington correspondent reported on Sunday.

"On March 31, 12 Iranians of the Shahid Hemmat Industrial Group (SHIG) arrived in North Korea. "The Iranians undoubtedly were there to observe the missile launch and receive test data from North Korea," the correspondent quoted a diplomatic source, who wished to remain anonymous, as saying.

Defying international pressure, Pyongyang launched a long-range missile, but U.S. and South Korean officials said it crashed into the sea a few minutes after launch, dealing a blow to the reclusive state.

The launch of the three-stage Unha-3 rocket took place at 7:39 a.m. local time on Friday, according to South Korean officials. Pyongyang has claimed that the launch was meant to place a communications satellite in space, but the United States, Japan, South Korea and other nations view it as part of North Korea's attempt to advance its military ballistic missile capacity.

The launch was timed to celebrate the 100th birthday of Kim Il-sung, the deceased founder of the state, and to coincide with the ascent to power of his grandson Kim Jong-un.

North Korea admitted its long-range rocket failed to deliver a satellite into orbit on Friday, and the United States condemned the provocative action as a threat to regional security.

Yad Vashem releases new Soviet documents

Revital Blumenfeld
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — More than a million new testimonial pages about Jews in the Soviet Union will be released by Yad Vashem, starting today, in the wake of agreements with the KGB archives and the national archives of Ukraine, Belarus, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia.

The documents, which include personal papers belonging to World War II survivors from these states, are expected to help researchers measure the scope of persecution and extermination of Jews in the former Soviet Union.

"There are many black holes concerning communities and individuals in central and eastern Europe, where the majority of Jews lived," says Haim Gertner, head of the archives division of the Yad Vashem World Center for Holocaust Research, Documentation and Education. "It has been very difficult for us to copy records from this region. It includes entire villages that were wiped out by the Nazis in one day, and nobody was left to narrate what happened."

Since the Iron Curtain fell in 1991, materials documenting the lives of Jews in the Soviet Union began to accumulate, but they were relayed to the West in small batches. In the current documentation project, personal papers belonging to survivors from these states were copied by Yad Vashem crews over the past two years. The document collection includes passports, identity papers, documents about house use (attesting to entry and occupation procedures enforced under Communist rule), demographic registries, medical records, personal files of schoolteachers and more. The records cover the lives of Jews before, during and after the war.

Arkadi Zeltser, head of Yad Vashem's centre for the research of Jews of the Soviet Union during the Holocaust, says the new documents should help break the silence surrounding the murder of Jews in the Soviet Union. On the eve of the war, some five million Jews lived in the Soviet Union. By the end of the war, some 2.7 million had been murdered, estimates Zeltser, one of many researchers who refer to the extermination of Jews of the former Soviet Union as the "Holocaust that was silenced."

"The Holocaust of Jews in the former Soviet Union was never written about as a phenomenon of genocide. They [the Soviets] claimed that Soviet Jews were murdered as Soviet citizens, not as Jews," says Zeltser, adding that the process of breaking the silence "will be a very long one."

The records include those of renowned Jews such as former prime minister Menachem Begin. "Begin was detained by the Soviet authorities on charges of anti-Communist, Zionist activity," notes Gertner. "The investigation file has 140 pages, in which everything is recorded, including who he was, what he studied, his fingerprints and more. We are copying hundreds of files of people who had no idea that they were under investigation."

Haim Gertner

The cache of papers is also shedding light on little-known heroes. One dramatic story that has never been disclosed is that of Chaim Feyglman, commander of Unit 106 of the Jewish partisan platoon, which operated in Belarus during World War II.

Feyglman grew up in a large family, in a town near Minsk. When war erupted in Belarus in 1941, he was detained while trying to escape from Minsk and return to his hometown. He was first sent to the Drozdi concentration camp, close to Minsk, and later transferred to a prison in Minsk, while his family remained in the city's ghetto. Feyglman managed to elude the Nazis. He found work in the ghetto's hospital, where he met Hersh Smolar, who later became a leader of the ghetto underground. Together with Smolar, Feyglman established the ghetto's underground in August 1941. Feyglman had access to a storage area in the ghetto where firearms and medicine were kept, and he smuggled items to the partisans. When the Nazis learned about the hospital's underground cell, they murdered all the patients and doctors in the facility.

In August 1942, the Nazis murdered some 20,000 residents of the ghetto via gas trucks. At the end of June 1943, Feyglman escaped to neighbouring forests, and became the commissar of Unit 106, which had 1,000 fighters. The unit took part in a number of underground missions, including the dynamiting of railroad tracks. In July 1944, the unit disbanded and Feyglman was discharged. He worked at a series of jobs until he retired in April 1977. Feyglman, who was injured during the war, had a son, a daughter and grandchildren. In 1991, he immigrated to Israel, together with his daughter and her family. Testimony provided by his comrades after the war was held at an archive in Belarus. These documents, together with Feyglman's personal papers, allow researchers to piece together his dramatic life story.

Yad Vashem begins releasing the documents today, on Holocaust Remembrance Day. The agreements, signed between Yad Vashem and the various national archives about five months ago, were supported by the Genesis Foundation and the European Jewish Fund.

Arab who sold property to Jews sentenced to death

JTA

JERUSALEM — Jewish leaders in Hebron have called for international intervention to help the Palestinian man sentenced to death for selling a home near the Cave of the Patriarchs to Jews.

A letter on behalf of Muhammad Abu Shahala, a former intelligence agent for the Palestinian Authority, was signed by Hebron Jewish community leaders David Wilder and Noam Arnon, and addressed to, among others, the secretary general of the United Nations Ban Ki-moon, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the president of the European Council of the European Union, Herman Van Rompuy, and the director general of the International Red Cross, Yves Daccord, among others.

Shahala reportedly was sentenced to death for his part in selling to a group of Jews what has become known as the Machpelah House. He reportedly confessed to the sale after torture and was given a rushed trial, according to Arutz-7, which cited various news agencies. Palestinian officials said Shahala was not authorized to sell the home.

The death warrant still has to be signed by Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas, according to reports.

"It is appalling to think that property sales should be defined as a 'capital crime' punishable by death," the Jewish leaders write in their letter. "The very fact that such a 'law' exists within the framework of the PA legal system points to a barbaric and perverse type of justice, reminiscent of practices implemented during the dark ages.

"What would be the reaction to a law in the United States, England, France or Switzerland forbidding property sales to Jews? Actually, less than 100 years ago, such acts were legislated and practised, known as the infamous 'Nuremberg laws.'"

At least seven Jewish families were evicted from the house earlier this month, a week after they entered the home in the middle of the night on March 28 armed with documents saying they had purchased the building from its Arab owner.

'Fly-in' protesters detained at Ben Gurion Airport

JTA

JERUSALEM — At least 43 foreign pro-Palestinian activists who arrived in Israel for a "fly-in" protest were detained at Ben-Gurion Airport.

Two protesters, citizens of France and Italy, made it through security to Bethlehem.

Thirty-one of the detained activists were transferred to a detention centre and 12 were deported to their point of origin, Israel Police told reporters. Nine local activists who protested the detentions at the airport also were arrested.

The foreign activists who arrived Sunday from several European countries and North America are part of the "Welcome to Palestine" campaign in which activists declare their intention to travel to the West Bank to highlight that there is no way to visit what they call Palestine without travelling through Israel.

The group had plans to travel to Bethlehem and lay a cornerstone for an educational institution. The campaign said it expected up to 2,500 activists to attempt to make it to Israel.

Several airlines, including Lufthansa, Air France and Easyjet, cancelled the flights of known activists before they could leave from their points of origin. Israel had requested that airlines prevent activists from boarding flights. In addition, if fliers are turned away from Israel and put on a flight back to their point of origin, the airline must absorb the cost of the return flight.

More than 600 unarmed police were stationed at Ben-Gurion Airport to intercept the activists who arrive in Israel unchallenged, according to Israel Radio.

Several dozen pro-Palestinian activists protested Sunday morning at the airport in Geneva, Switzerland, saying that authorities prevented about 100 activists from boarding a flight bound for Israel.

Dozens of activists reportedly also protested at Charles de Gaulle Airport in Paris after being denied entry to their flights to Israel. The protesters chanted "Today the barrier is here" and "Israel get out, France is not yours."

Sunday, the day after Passover ended, is one of Ben-Gurion Airport's busiest flying days.

Activists who managed to arrive in Israel reportedly received a sarcastic letter issued by the Prime Minister's Office thanking them for "choosing to make Israel the object of your humanitarian choices" instead of protesting human rights abuses and terrorists in Syria, Iran and Gaza, according to Jerusalem Post, which printed a copy of the letter.

The letter suggests to the activists that they "first solve the real problems of the region, and then come back and share with us your experience." It also tells them to "Have a nice flight."

Last July, some 300 activists flew to Israel for a protest fly-in. About 120 were detained.

Israel Briefs

Massive fraud alleged

A senior executive of a Jerusalem-based charity that purported to aid the needy and Holocaust survivors was ordered to remain in custody on suspicion of stealing tens of millions of shekels from international donors. The official, who cannot be named, and nine other employees of the nonprofit are accused by police of conducting a "massive scheme" to mislead Israeli and international donors about the scope of its aid to Israel's poor and Holocaust survivors. Operators of the charity are accused of pocketing "tens of millions of shekels" in donations and selling food earmarked for Holocaust survivors and the needy.

Navies co-operate

The Israel Navy has strengthened its co-operation with the Lebanese Navy in the Mediterranean as it prepares for possible pro-Palestinian flotillas to Gaza on Nakba Day later this month. According to Israel Navy officials, the indirect co-operation between the two navies has increased. The Lebanese Navy has also recently aided the IDF in driving out foreign fishing boats that have been approaching Israeli waters.

Attack prevented

Israeli soldiers discovered seven homemade bombs on the body of a Palestinian man at a checkpoint in the Jordan Valley. The 19-year-old Palestinian tried to cross the checkpoint with the bombs and several knives, according to the Israel Defence Forces. He planned to attack during the intermediate days of Passover. It's at least the third time in recent months that a Palestinian planning to carry out a terror attack has been caught at the same checkpoint.

Urban renewal and missed opportunities

Doron Tsur

TEL AVIV — Everyone is waiting to see whether masses of protesters fill Tel Aviv's Rothschild Boulevard this year, after last summer's demonstrations. But strolling down the boulevard and the nearby streets, one can't help but notice a socio-economic phenomenon of an entirely different sort.

It seems construction work is taking place on every other building and on every empty lot. On some sites, we're talking about high-rise apartment buildings or huge, glittering office towers; elsewhere, it's the renovation and preservation of old structures, newly beautiful in their fresh paint.

At the corner of Ahad Ha'am and Balfour streets, an old building is being expanded and renovated. Beneath it a huge pit is being dug for underground parking. In the end, the sign promises, the project will turn an old, neglected three-storey building into a renovated gem, with additional floors on top.

For decades, a process has been taking place in Israel that would be familiar to urban dwellers around the world. City centres have deteriorated, losing their residents as well as their spirit.

The desire to move from old, crowded apartments to more spacious and modern housing in outlying neighbourhoods and the suburbs where it's more convenient to raise children creates a clear social process. Young people gradually leave, city centres lose their affluent young population, public services deteriorate and building maintenance is neglected. It's a self-sustaining downward spiral: abandonment leads to neglect, neglect leads to abandonment.

That happened in Tel Aviv, too. Over many years, the city centre was gradually abandoned. Apartments and whole apartment buildings were turned into offices and warehouses. For anyone who could afford it, the urban fabric moved north or outside the city.

Of course, that happened in Haifa and Jerusalem, too, not just in Tel Aviv.

Since this is a long-term, self-perpetuating economic and social process, it isn't easy to reverse. Municipalities all over the world are racking their brains in an attempt to reverse the decline of city centres.

In Israel, this is egregious waste. Israel is a small, crowded country that is becoming more crowded. It's very hard to find available land for construction, and everyone rightly wants to preserve open green spaces. Meanwhile, thousands of old buildings stand in wretched condition in city centres, half empty or not used for housing. They're an eyesore.

The good news is that if, for any reason, the trend is reversed and renewal begins, that process is self-sustaining, too. The well-to-do move to the city centre, creating momentum for change. That's what's been happening in Tel Aviv in recent years – the hammering on Rothschild Boulevard and nearby is a clear sign.

Of course, everything good has a downside. The construction momentum in the heart of Tel Aviv, which has positive economic implications for both the country and the municipality, couldn't have taken place without the price increases of recent years. This process is strongly in evidence in Tel Aviv, but barely so in other city centres that have suffered similar declines.

The economy has its own slow ways of restoring balance. Despite the waste and urban blight, an old and neglected building can stand deserted for years if the sale price after the investment in renovation doesn't generate a profit. But if the prices increase enough, the financial interest of the landlords and the developers who are pushing for renovation or construction will overcome any obstacle. That's what's happening now.

On the other hand, if prices increase too much, no buyers will be found for these buildings, and the process will stop. In the end, things balance out, but slowly. In the case of construction and renovation in the city centre, the problem becomes even more acute because the municipality wants – and rightly so – to preserve buildings of architectural and historic value. That greatly increases construction costs.

It's much cheaper and easier to put up a new building on the ruins of an old one than to renovate an existing building. But a city has to preserve its past and its character. That's in the public interest. The result is that without high sales prices, there will be no renewal. There will be no preservation and renovation on the one hand, and no high-rise buildings on the other.

This process is taking place now in Tel Aviv, both in the city centre and in the more neglected area south of the city. But we barely see it, for example, in Haifa's lower city, which could be an urban jewel. The reason is prices.

If real estate prices in Haifa increased significantly, it would be worth it to renovate the historic buildings in the lower city. At present, any brief tour of the area creates a sense of missed opportunity – the built-up area could look so much nicer.

So, if you've been hoping for a sharp decline in housing prices, you should be careful about what you're wishing for. Below a certain price level, the momentum of urban construction and renewal that we're seeing in Tel Aviv will stop with a screech. In other places, we won't even have a chance to begin.

The good news is that wherever resources have been wasted, there is room for improvement. The global economic outlook isn't bright these days, and that will affect us too. Momentum for urban renewal and massive rehabilitation of city centres could generate economic activity in Israel, which would compensate somewhat for the global slowdown.

In the past, global recessions actually benefited the Israeli construction market. When the situation around the world is tough, more Israelis return and fewer leave the country. There's also an increase in immigration. This process creates greater demand for housing.

The spring holidays are a good time to think about renewal. Let's hope the process we're seeing in Tel Aviv picks up speed and spreads. The decline and neglect of our city centres went on for decades – two generations. Renewal will also last many years. Someone walking slowly in the right direction will reach his destination faster than someone walking fast in the wrong direction.

Secret World of Stolen Art reads like crime fiction

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

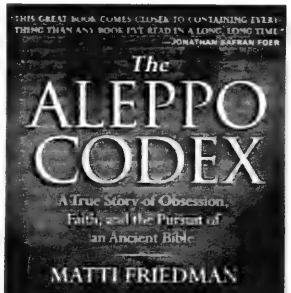
Some years ago, while researching an article for The Walrus magazine on art theft, Joshua Knelman interviewed a convicted art thief in a Toronto restaurant. While providing some quotable patter, the thief threatened to break Knelman's legs if he used his real name, and handed him some rolled-up items, which proved to be stolen artworks, now bearing Knelman's own fingerprints. But the Toronto writer survived this brush with danger and found that rogues can also be gentlemen. After his story appeared, the thief phoned to let him know "how much I enjoyed your piece."

For some reason probably having to do with Hollywood, the subject of art theft seems sexy, even glamorous, and Knelman soon won a contract for a book. Hot Art: Chasing Thieves and Detectives through the Secret World of Stolen Art (Douglas & McIntyre) is a colourful, tautly written narrative in the true-crime genre featuring characters from both sides of the fence: sharp detectives, wealthy collectors, talkative criminals, and art dealers and gallery owners. As Knelman chronicles, some dealers and gallery owners sit on both sides of the fence –simultaneously fencing stolen goods while fencing off suggestions of their complicity in the highly profitable black market of stolen art.

Hot Art opens with a CSI-type investigation of a burglary in a Los Angeles gallery, conducted by LAPD detective Donald Hrycyk, one of only a handful of police specialists in stolen art in North America and Europe. Another chapter introduces us to Richard Ellis, the detective who started Scotland Yard's Art and Antiques Squad, who has helped to recover Edvard Munch's The Scream and works by Vermeer, Goya, Rubens and other high-profile artists.

Here the narrative veers deliciously into ransoms, raids and other cops-and-robbers-type high jinks. Knelman also interviewed special agent Robert K. Wittman, senior art investigator for the FBI, as well as Alain Lacoursiere, a dedicated stolen-art detective in Montreal.

Although Toronto doesn't have a dedicated police pro, the city may claim lawyer Bonnie Czegledi as its own. Czegledi is a leading international authority in stolen art and a key source for Knelman. After years in the art world, she is still amazed when lawyers ask her advice on how to sell a valuable antique tapestry that had been stolen during World War II. "You shouldn't be selling a piece of art if it's been stolen! And you don't need to be a lawyer to understand that," she tells Knelman after receiving such a call. But she long ago realized that the lawyer's attitude is typical and that it is her own that is deviant.



THIS GREAT BOOK COMES CLOSER TO CONTAINING EVERYTHING THAN ANY BOOK I'VE READ IN A LONG, LONG TIME"

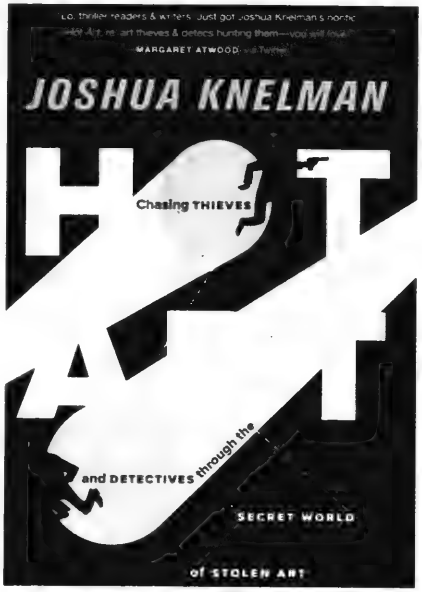
MATTI FRIEDMAN
A TREASURE BOX OF HISTORY, MYSTERY, CONSPIRACY, AND CONVOLUTIONS THAT WOULD DO ANY BIBLICAL THRILLER PROUD. A REMARKABLE JOB."
—BOOKLIST

Paul, the brash British career-thief and "Brighton knocker" who steals much of the limelight in Hot Art, seems to understand this attitude better than anyone. "I'd go as far as to say that the term 'honest antique dealer' is an oxymoron," he comments. "No one cares about selling stolen art as long as you're smart about it. It's not even considered criminal. It's more as if it's naughty behaviour. You know… wink, wink. It's the norm."



Paul apprenticed by knocking on doors in the seaside retirement community of Brighton, England, offering to buy antiques from residents while secretly casing their premises for valuables to loot. Eventually, he knocked on doors across England and had teams of thieves working for him. He disposed of the merchandise in antique markets, usually for 10 per cent of its presumed value.

To what did he attribute his largely successful career? For one thing, he never attempted to do the burgling himself, realizing after one early bungled attempt that he was terribly clumsy at it. "I'm so sorry to disturb you," he had told the couple he had awakened in the middle of the night. "You have my word that I will never break into another house again in my life." He kept his promise.

Paul "kept below the radar," never pulling spectacular heists, never keeping stolen goods in his possession for long, and never going after what he called "headache art" – high-profile works with equally high price tags that would be impossible to fence. He also conducted much of his business in towns far from his own home. "I became very good at a bad thing," he told Knelman. "Actually, I became ruthless. Margaret Thatcher had swept to power in Britain in 1979, her Conservative party preaching an aggressive brand of capitalism. These were the '80s. It was a decade of excess, and I was a pure, cutthroat capitalist."

In a chapter titled Headache Art, Knelman recounts the tale of a 1981 theft of 10 paintings from a major London gallery, including a small Rembrandt then worth more than $20 million. Another chapter is devoted to the looting of the National Museum of Iraq in Baghdad after the second U.S. invasion and the largely futile attempts of a U.S. military investigator, Matthew Bogdanos, to recover the scattered antiquities. At the international level, as at the domestic level, there is a pathetic lack of official attention paid to the problem of the black market in stolen art and its obvious links to organized crime.

Knelman describes several noble attempts to create a comprehensive catalogue of stolen art, most notably the Art Loss Register, which allows dealers to research works of unknown provenance being offered to them at bargain-basement prices. Understandably, many dealers prefer to remain ignorant – and rich. As art prices continue to soar, some estimate stolen art as a $4- to $6-billion industry globally. It may be much higher; no one knows for sure.

Although Hot Art lacks a neat conclusion and seems to repeat itself toward the end, it is still, for most of its length, an enjoyable and compelling page-turner in the best true-crime tradition.

Matti Friedman's The Aleppo Codex: A True Story of Obsession, Faith, and the Pursuit of an Ancient Book (Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill) is a true-life detective story that provides a new theory about how the 10th-century Codex, a sacred Hebrew Bible, was spirited from a grotto in Aleppo, Syria, in 1940 to its new home in the Israel Museum, the country's national museum in Jerusalem, losing some pages en route.

Upon first encountering the Codex in 2008, Friedman, a staff reporter of the Associated Press in Jerusalem, resolved to uncover its secret journey. He found that official accounts of the Codex seemed "oddly blurred and contradictory" and that when he asked pointed questions, many doors were closed in his face. That made him even more determined to delve into the "real-life mystery with clues still hiding in forgotten crates of documents and in aging minds."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Festival offers something completely different

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival returns in May, and as usual, there's a huge variety of movies (over 95) to choose from. In addition to the heavy, historical or Holocaust-themed films and documentaries, there's also a wealth of off-the-wall comedies and light-hearted movies. I've picked out four of these for closer examination:

The first is How to Re-establish a Vodka Empire by Dan Edelstyn, a rather unusual, funny documentary about the young British filmmaker's quest to track his ancestor's pre-revolutionary business in Ukraine.

His quest begins when he discovers his grandmother Maroussia's ancient manuscript in an old suticase at his mother's home in England. Reading the manuscript, he finds himself intrigued by her story.

Maroussia was the daughter of a wealthy Jewish sugar factory owner some 200 kilometres from Kiev in Ukraine. After the Communist revolution, she fled and ended up in Northern Ireland.

Edelstein decides to go to Ukraine to seek out his family factory, bringing his wife, Hilary, along to film his quest.

All he has to go on is his family's last name, Zorokovich, and the knowledge that, somewhere in Ukraine was a sugar factory that once belonged to them.

Secretly he dreams that he will find the factory and ask for the key, offering a hundred spasibas (thank-yous) if its current owners leave without a fuss.

After several weeks of searching through archives, he finds the factory, only to discover that it closed down in 2000, leaving the small town destitute and run down. By chance, though, talking to an old villager, he finds that the Zorokoviches owned another factory – a vodka factory not too far away.

Edelstyn presumes that his grandmother never mentioned the vodka factory in her manuscript to avoid the stereotypical antisemitic charges that Jews were alcohol peddlers stupefying the Christian peasants so that they could go about their sinister deeds without impediment.

Finding the vodka factory still up and running, he goes back to England with the dream of raising money to buy the factory. Realizing the impracticality of that, he instead dreams up a smaller scheme to import and sell the vodka in England.

This lighthearted documentary follows Edelstyn's ups and downs in trying to launch the product and, at the same time, uses hilarious low-budget sepia-toned re-enactments to parallel his grandmother's quest to escape Russia.

A film about a vodka importer seems an odd choice for a tongue-in-cheek documentary. But it works. It's a must-see. Try to sneak a bottle of vodka and some dried fish tails into the theatre. But if you get caught, don't mention that we told you to.

If that's not really your thing, you might prefer the more straightforward romantic comedy Dorfman.

Debbie Dorfman is a mousy, single woman who lives with her depressed, widowed father, played by veteran Elliot Gould, in the suburbs of L.A.

She works in her brother's accounting firm and has a lifelong crush on Jay, a reporter, who, she admits, doesn't see her the same way.

When she finds out he's going to spend a week in Kabul, she volunteers to stay at his downtown L.A. apartment to look after his cat. Over the course of the week, she goes through a self-discovery period, meets an artist, befriends models and tries to keep her brother from destroying his marriage.

Dorfman is low-key and a bit hokey at times, but Sara Rue (Stephanie on Big Bang Theory) as the title character makes it work. Viewers will also enjoy Gould's Woody Allen-esque neurotic character who spouts Yiddishisms effortlessly.

And now for something completely different: if you're a fan of the irreverent humour of Monty Python, you'll love the Israeli film This is Sodom.

An ode to such Python biblical spoofs as Life of Brian, This is Sodom takes the story of Lot and – well, makes it its own.

It begins with God, dressed in a three-piece suit and wearing a "Gumby hat"– a handkerchief tied at the corners and worn over the head – knocking on Abraham's door.

He tries to sell Abraham monotheism and insurance from crime and calamity. If Abraham signs on, God says, he will destroy the sinful city of Sodom and turn it into a parking lot.

Abraham signs on, but he is worried about the fate of Sodom's only righteous man, Lot, (social insurance number 0 000 000 006), who runs the only legal gambling kiosk in the city. God agrees and dispatches his motorcycle police, Raphael and Michael, to rescue Lot.

This Is Sodom is a tribute to Pythonesque humour.

Mayhem follows when Sodom's mayor hatches a plot to replace Lot and be rescued in his place.

There are a lot of silly puns, fart jokes, innuendos and even stupid songs. In Python style, Lot's wife, named Lot's Wife, is played by a male actor and Lot wears an outfit that is exactly like the one worn by Brian in Life of Brian.

Surprisingly, the gags hold up for 90 minutes, and along the way, the film makes fun of contemporary Israeli politics, Susan Boyle, Georgian thugs and reality TV. Highly recommended for those with an off-kilter sense of humour. In Hebrew with subtitles, this was Israel's biggest blockbuster in 25 years.

Finally, there is the less absurd, though quite charming, coming-of-age Israeli "dramedy" Off-White Lies.

Libby, wonderfully played by Elya Inbar, is a 13-year-old girl who is sent by her mother in California to live with her estranged father in Israel.

The trouble is that it's not such a great time for him. The failed gadget inventor is currently "in between homes," meaning he's homeless and unemployed. After picking her up from the airport in an old girlfriend's car, he drives up north to stay with a friend.

But just as he arrives there, Hezbollah begins lobbing missiles over the Lebanon border and they're forced into a bomb shelter.

Leaving his friend, he seizes an opportunity, and pretending to be refugees from the beseiged north, they stay with a family in Jerusalem, one of many who took in displaced people during the crisis.

There, the father perfects his new gadget, the Smokeless, a portable filter device that allows smokers to smoke in public without sharing the smoke and smell. Perfect, he figures, for people in bomb shelters.

But just when his invention is about to take off, something happens between him and his daughter that forces him to reconsider his priorities.

Off-White Lies, also in Hebrew, with a smattering of American slang and subtitles, is a moving and delightful film.

Names in the News: Montreal-born singer Kathleen Reiter, who only recently made aliyah to Israel, has been crowned victor on the Israeli television show The Voice after wowing the judges and audience with a performance of British singer Adele's song Rolling in the Deep. The video is on YouTube at http://bit.ly/zZ6Mnt.

Last October, Reiter got all four judges on the vastly popular live talent show to turn around in their seats, signalling they liked what they heard. In fact, they seemed to find it irresistible. Earlier this month Reiter, who was the only contestant to sing in English, French and Hebrew, was chosen the season's favourite performer. She's already released her first single, a dance number that is getting lots of radio play in Israel. "The goal is to get to a place where I can release an album and play shows and all of that stuff," the powerfully voiced 23-year-old told a reporter.

Alon Eizenman named to U.S. college Hall of Fame

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Alon Eizenman, a former centre for the Penn State Nittany Lions, has been named to the American Collegiate Hockey Association (ACHA) Hall of Fame.

Eizenman will be inducted into the Hall at a ceremony on April 28 in Naples, Fla.

News of the induction came "completely out of the blue," Eizenman said. He was informed of the honour by his former coach – and fellow hall member – Joe Battista. "I was completely unprepared," Eizenman said. "It's really nice. I'm the third player inducted."

Eizenman played for Penn State from 1997 to 2001 and guided the team to four consecutive ACHA men's Division 1 national championship games, winning in 1998, 2000 and 2001. He was named the ACHA men's Division 1 player of the year in 2000 to go along with the Bob Johnson Award, given to the player who best demonstrated hockey ability, achievement, leadership, sportsmanship, as well as academic excellence and community service.

A four time ACHA men's Division 1 All-American, he was also an Academic All-American and was twice named most valuable player in the men's Division 1 national championships.

The ACHA is a U.S. college league that differs from the NCAA in that it doesn't offer scholarships. Observers consider top ACHA teams more or less the same calibre as NCAA Division III teams.

Alon Eizenman

Alon, along with his brothers Erez and Oren, represented Israel internationally. He helped lead the Israeli team to a gold medal in an IIHF Group D tournament in 2000 and to another gold in Division II action in 2005.

Eizenman attended the Pittsburgh Penguins training camp and played two seasons of professional hockey in France. He averaged more than a point per game with A.S.G. Tours and led the team to the Magnus Cup finals in 2005.

After being called to the bar in Ontario, he joined the law firm of Stikeman Elliott, where he specializes in municipal and planning law.

He still plays recreational hockey a couple of time a week. The most competitive games he plays now come during the Christmas season. He's been a part of the Israeli Stars of David in the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championship, a tournament the Stars of David have won three of the last four times.

Looking back on his career, he said that "the single biggest and most important memory for me was when I scored the overtime goal to win the national championship in my junior year, 1999-2000. If I have one memory from all my playing days, that's the one. Everyone who plays hockey dreams of scoring the winning goal in a championship."

Israeli sailors finish high in Spanish regatta

Arie Livnat
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Olympic hopefuls Gidi Kliger and Eran Sela took fourth place in the mens 470 class in the 43rd Trofeo S.A.R. Princesa Sofia MAPFRE, the third event in the ISAF Sailing World Cup circuit in Mallorca, Spain last week, protecting their silver medal in the overall standings.

Kliger and Sela set out for the medal race in second place and knew they would take home a medal. During the race, they opened up a formidable lead over their main competitors, the French pair of Pierre Leboucher and Vincent Garos, who finished in fourth place.

It was enough to maintain their second-place position in the overall standings. They finished the competition with 57 points, 18 more than Australians Mathew Belcher and Malcolm Page.

In January, Kliger and Sela set out for Miami for the first round of the current World Sailing Championships, and finished eighth in the 470 class.

"We competed without our boat," Kliger explained. "We rented a boat, and it was like a training exercise. So it didn't count."

The second competition, in Palme de Mallorca, was another story.

"We are very pleased," Kliger said. "All the competitions this year are important, but today's had special import, because this competition is like the Olympics, and we wanted to see where we stand. We started the medals race with a medal guaranteed, and we finished with a big lead over our competitors, and that's a great sign."

Eyal Levin, Kliger and Sela's manager, said: "All the best sailing crews took part in this competition. The first day went a little less well, but as the days went by, things looked up. This achievement will give Gidi and Eran a lot of confidence for the future."

Vered Buskila and Gil Cohen came in sixth place in the women's competition. They finished sixth in the medals race.

Crisis-hit Greek Jews fear for their future

Gavin Rabinowitz
JTA

ATHENS, Greece — Patricia Alcalay, 24, has been unemployed since she finished her nursing degree in December 2010. Her father lost his job four months ago, a year shy of retirement.

Her older sister, who was studying abroad, meanwhile, found work in the Netherlands and is not coming back to Greece anytime soon.

Stories like these have become common among the Jewish community in Greece, which, like the rest of the Greek population, is struggling to stay afloat in a country engulfed in the fifth year of an economic crisis that shows no sign of abating.

For the young, the future looks like a wasteland

Approximately 5,000 Jews live in Greece – about 3,500 in Athens, 1,000 in Thessaloniki and the rest scattered elsewhere – and community leaders say they are labouring to maintain Jewish institutions and deal with the additional heavy demands on welfare programs.

Some of the leaders fear a greater threat to the community's future: an exodus of young, unemployed Jews leaving a country where they see little hope.

"It is a very difficult situation for us because of the financial crisis in Greece. It affects the Jewish community very heavily," said Benjamin Albalas, the president of the Jewish Community of Athens, an association that provides funding for the city's Jewish institutions. "We are supporting two synagogues, the school, the cemetery, a community centre and a number of needy people that is growing all the time."

As the need for community aid has increased, the funding to the communal institution has decreased sharply.

Much of its revenue comes from Jewish community-owned commercial and residential properties dating back before World War II, when some 78,000 Jews lived in Greece – many in the northern port city of Thessaloniki, a community that was almost wiped out entirely in the Holocaust.

But in the past year the Greek government, faced with chronic income tax evasion, imposed steep property taxes in a bid to raise state income. "And because of the general situation, the people who rent our properties have either left or they have asked us to lower rents," Albalas said.

'Our two main problems now since the crisis are that pensions have gone down and there is very big unemployment'

In addition, he said, donations from hard-hit community members have dropped 50 per cent.

Albalas declined to give specific figures, either for income or for the needs.

As part of the harsh austerity measures imposed on Athens, the Greek government has slashed pensions, lowered public and private sector wages, and reduced tens of thousands of state jobs, all of which have hurt the weaker sectors of the Jewish community.

"Our two main problems now since the crisis are that pensions have gone down and there is very big unemployment," said Isaak Mordechai, the deputy head of the Athens welfare committee. "Pensions have diminished so much, people cannot live."

The Jewish Community of Athens is providing direct assistance – financial help, supermarket food vouchers, and medical and psychological support – to some 60 people. "But it is clear that a lot more people are going to need help," he said.

Thousands of Greeks recently took to the streets in Athens to protest the austerity reforms implemented by their government. [Flash90 photo]

In February, the Jewish Agency for Israel's Board of Governors voted to grant about $1 million over two years to help Greece's Jewish communal institutions continue operating. Other Jewish groups have offered aid, too.

However, community leaders in Athens and Thessaloniki say they have not been officially informed of the decision and the money has yet to arrive.

The money, though, will focus on Israel education, and is earmarked to help the Jewish communities of Athens and Thessaloniki cover specific initiatives, according to JAFI spokesperson Josh Berkman. Among those initiatives are shlichim (Israel emissaries to the community), counsellors for the Jewish summer camp and financial assistance to the Jewish school in Athens.

"I can assure you we are in touch with the Jewish leadership in these communities," Berkman said.

As of late February, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee had donated $330,000 for welfare and school scholarship to the Athens Jewish Community, according to a news release.

Such funding, however, will not keep the institutions alive and support the needy.

National unemployment is more than 21 per cent and tops 50 per cent among those under 25. Albalas says the levels are about the same in the Jewish community.

For the young, the future looks like a wasteland.

"I have occasionally had some part-time jobs, but nothing permanent. It's very disappointing," said Alcalay, who has been searching for work as a nurse for 16 months and is considering abandoning her profession.

"I'm looking for a job in any field now because I need the money. I don't have anything else apart from my parents, and both of them are also unemployed," she said.

Alcalay is not alone.

"There are many of my friends who have just finished university this year or last and can't find jobs," said Evie Leon, 24, a former head of the Jewish Youth of Athens.

The community tries to help. Jewish businessmen network to find jobs for the young unemployed. Two young men receive stipends for taking part in daily minyan.

"We are talking about simple jobs. We are not head hunting," Mordechai said.

But ultimately it is not enough.

"The unemployment is so bad that unfortunately they are leaving for abroad, either to study or find work," said David Saltiel, who heads Thessaloniki's Jewish community, where the situation is equally grim, and is president of the Central Board of Jewish Communities in Greece.

Leon says her friends in Greece are "depressed and stressed." The rest have left and "are not planning on coming back until the situation gets much, much better." Even though she has a job, she also is "looking into opportunities to leave the country."

Alcalay's 25-year-old sister is among those who left to study and did not return after she found a job with an information technology company in the Netherlands.

"She wants to come back in a few years, but I don't recommend it," Alcalay said. "Even though I love her, I say, 'Don't come back because you will be unemployed.'"

Those who leave are doing what they can for themselves and their families. But leaders know and fear the toll this will have on the community.

"When our young generation leaves and becomes well established abroad, I think it will be difficult for them to return," Saltiel said. "We will become a community of old people."

LAWYER ADVOCATES FOR PALESTINIAN CHILD SUICIDE BOMBERS

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

It was the haunting image of a misguided 15-year-old Palestinian boy – a would-be suicide bomber with eight kilograms of explosives strapped to his chest – that sent human rights attorney Brooke Goldstein on an entirely different career path.

The 31-year-old Toronto native was studying to be an entertainment lawyer at the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law in New York in 2004 when she saw a news report that shook her to her core.

"I was in my second year of law school taking an elective course called human rights and the child," Goldstein recalled.

"I came home and I sat on my couch with my homework, turned on my TV and I saw this image of a 15-year-old physically [stunted], rumoured to be mentally handicapped [boy, who] had his arms in the air and he had this explosive belt strapped around his waist."

She said at that point, in 2004, adult male suicide bombers were not a new phenomenon, but this was the first time she'd seen a child converted into a human bomb.

"It was reprehensible and egregious, and I was shocked," Goldstein said.

Hussam Abdo had been sent by the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades to the Hawara checkpoint out of Nablus in the West Bank to kill Israeli soldiers manning the checkpoint.

But at the last minute, Abdo either got caught by the soldiers or turned himself in to the Israel Defence Forces because he decided he didn't want to die (reports vary).

Abdo was tried and convicted of attempted murder and is serving what is left of his eight-year prison sentence in an Israeli jail. When Goldstein learned that Abdo had been convicted, it didn't sit right with her.

"I thought, 'Wait a minute, we learn about [African] child soldiers and we learn about them as victims. Surely, a child suicide bomber is as much a victim of an egregious form of child abuse as are child soldiers in Africa,'" she said.

"I didn't think he deserved to pay for the crimes of the adults who recruited him. On the other hand, Israelis are stuck between a rock and hard place because once they captured this child, they have a fiduciary duty over him. They can't just release him back into a society that just tried to kill him."

This dilemma compelled Goldstein to learn more about the glamorization of martyrdom and the lack of coverage in the mainstream media about the murder of Muslim men and women in Islamic society.

She said she raised some money, teamed up with a producer and travelled to Palestinian cities, including Jenin and Ramallah, to conduct interviews with leaders of terrorist organizations and families of suicide bombers.

These interviews resulted in an award-winning 2006 documentary called The Making of a Martyr, which examines the state-sponsored indoctrination and recruitment of Palestinian children for suicide attacks.

Brooke Goldstein

"A big part of being a martyr is the 15 minutes of fame aspect. When you become a suicide bomber, you become a hero. You're in music videos, there are schools named after you, streets are named after you, people worship you, there are posters of you all over the place," she said.

"I was talking with teenaged fighters who don't necessarily understand the concept of death because they've been brainwashed to think they're going to heaven."

She said when her documentary began gaining recognition and winning awards, she took a year off after completing her law degree to screen her film at various film festivals.

"I became sort of de facto spokesperson for this phenomenon of child suicide bombers just because no one else was talking about it."

Taking advantage of the momentum that resulted from the film, in 2007 Goldstein founded the Children's Rights Institute, a non-profit organization that tracks and legally combats violations of children's basic human rights, with a special focus on child suicide-homicide bombers, child soldiers, and the phenomenon of human shields.

Goldstein caught the attention of the Middle East Forum founder Daniel Pipes, who hired her to run an arm of the organization called the Legal Project, which arranges pro-bono and reduced rate council for people wrongfully sued for speaking about issues of national security.

Goldstein, who directed the Legal Project for two years, said people who have the courage to speak out against terrorism and militant Islam are being sued in Europe and North America as a ploy to intimidate them into silence.

"They were doing this to intimidate them, to bankrupt them, to create a chilling effect on free speech about issues of national security," she said.

"I coined the term 'Islamist lawfare,' as a weapon of war, as a manipulation of the legal system to impose tenets of sharia law."

Goldstein currently directs the Lawfare Project, an organization that addresses the manipulation of legal systems – a strategy she feels is being employed to "delegitimize the rights of sovereign states such as Israel and the United States, and... to frustrate and hinder the ability of western democracies to fight against and defeat terrorism."

Goldstein's latest project is a book she co-authored last year, titled Lawfare Against Free Speech: A First Amendment Guide For Reporting in an Age of Islamist Lawfare, which gives practical guidance to journalists who want to write about national security threats.

"There were so many people calling and e-mailing me, expressing a desire to write about what's happening, and yet they were afraid... and wanted to know how to legally protect themselves."

Just last year, U.S. Representative Peter King (R-New York), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, held a series of congressional hearings on the radicalization of American Muslims.

"He put Somali parents on the stand to testify with tears in their eyes about how their children were practically being kidnapped by Al Qaeda – these are American-born Muslim children. They're being flown across borders and trained to become terrorists."

Goldstein said she was disgusted when media outlets labelled King as "Islamophobic" for advocating for the protection of Muslim children.

She said since her documentary was released in 2006, the phenomenon of child suicide bombers has become more widespread in the Middle East and has reached the West as well.

But she refuses to be discouraged and will continue to spread the word.

Goldstein plans to release two more books – one is a companion to her first book, which informs students who face antisemitism and other forms of discrimination on campus of their rights.

The second book she described as a memoir about her experience while filming The Making of a Martyr.

Goldstein said she's hoping to produce another film on the subject of terrorism and has ambitions to establish a Canadian chapter of the Lawfare Project.

For more information or to join Goldstein in her fight against terrorism, visit the Lawfare Project and/or the Children's Rights Institute websites for internship opportunities.

"שבוע הבא יום העצמאות!" מבשרת טלי לאומה, כשהאומה מתיישבת מולה עם הקפה שלה. "זוכרת איך קראנו לזה בישראל? יום העצבנות". אני מעלה נשכחות. "זוכרת איך עשינו טררם מכל העסק של המנגל, על-האש? היום, אין כמעט ערב או לפחות סופשבוע שאנחנו לא זורקים כמה נקניקיות, או עוף על הברביקיו בחצר. איך השתנו לנו החיים, מה, נינה? פה הכל פחות מסובך. אני: אני נורא שמחה לשמוע אותך אומרת את זה. בדרך כלל את נורא בעד 'לחזור הביתה', ו-'היה שם הכי טוב' ו'קנדה משעממת אותי, אין לי אתגרים'.

טלי: אני לא אומרת שרע לי פה. רק, את יודעת, געגועים. בכל זאת, איך כל המדינה הייתה יוצאת החוצה וחוגגת את יום ההולדת שלה? אנשים היו שמחים.

טלי: תירגעי, שמעתי, גם כל השולחנות לידינו ולא לידינו שמעו אותך.

אני: אז אני רוצה להגיד לך משהו (לוקחת שאיפה עמוקה וקולנית).

טלי (בוחנת אותי בדאגה קלה): מה, שאת אסמטית?

אני: גם, אבל עזבי. אני רוצה להגיד לך שזהו. נגמר יום העצמאות מבחינתי. אפילו לא ברביקיו סימלי. נכון, זו המולדת שלי, אבל כל כך הרבה דברים הרגיזו אותי שם. אתגרים חסרים לך כאן? בשבילי לתפוס מונית ולהתוודע, תוך כדי נסיעה של ארבע וחצי דקות, לכל מהלכי חייו של הנהג, כולל מסלול גירושיו המכוערים של האחיין של השכנה של אחותו המאומצת, זה אתגר. או, להיכנס לחנות ולהבין שהמוכרת שונאת אותי עד זוב דם, עוד לפני שהיא בעצמה גיבשה את התחושה, זה אתגר. או לקבל מבט מלוכלך מאיזה מכוער, רק בגלל שפעם אחת בקיץ הרותה, התחשק לי ללכת עם מיני, זה אתגר.

טלי: נו אפנס, אבל באמת לא טוב עלייך מיני. וחוץ מזה, מה רע פה ושם במבט זימה? אני הולכת כאן עם מיני, על עקבים, אחרי צבע ופן, כל ישראל כבר היתה לוטשת בי עיניים, ופה כלום. כאילו אני אוויר. נורא לא פמיליארי. זהו.

אני: דבר ראשון - נהדר! מכבדים את הפרטיות שלך! לא נכנסים לך לנשמה. דבר שני - גם לך לא משהו מיני.

טלי: אפשר להוציא אותך מישראל, נינה, אבל לא את ישראל ממך, מה?

אני (מהורהרת): אבל תודי שבישראל הברביקיו יותר טעים, לא יודעת למה...

Remember the seamstresses

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

An old Jewish woman stepped out of her home in a shtetl in Poland alone, her hands above her head. Her husband had died two years earlier and the couple had been without children.

She was known in the shtetl as the seamstress. She would get jobs, small ones, from the townsfolk. That's how she paid for wood to keep her hovel warm and enough food for the week. She was lent money from the kupah (the central fund for food for the poor) in the shul for food for Shabbat. That bill was almost paid.

The old woman was a compelling sort because she gave tzedakah despite the fact that her finances were so strained. When she would hand a coin to the destitute man sitting on a stool near the shul, she knew he would be eating that evening and she would not.

Although the Torah says you should not become poor yourself by giving more charity than you can, she didn't see herself that way – as poor, that is.

Once, a mother of a big brood of children asked the seamstress if she would do a complicated job for them and stitch all the family's woolen coats, as the winter was coming. The mother explained that she couldn't pay the seamstress for a few weeks. The old woman responded that she couldn't do the job because it would take her from the work she had to do for her paying customers.

Disheartened, the mother accepted the old woman's response. The old woman felt bad, but there was nothing she could do. She had been paying off a German soldier stationed in the village, so that he wouldn't take away her home. She was late with her payment and couldn't afford to take on a job with deferred compensation.

A single shot rang out and a bullet entered the old woman's heart. She stood for a moment, looked at the young Nazi soldier and then fell, relieved, at his feet.

Her body lay on the dirt pathway in front of her home all day. Evening arrived, and the woman with the brood of children came with her husband and neighbours to where the old woman lay, respectfully collected her body and put it in a cart.

They wheeled her to the Jewish cemetery, buried the old woman in a shallow grave, and the husband said a short eulogy.

"Here lies our town's seamstress. Once she was a child, then she became old and God took her. She sewed all of her life, a lofty occupation. The Jewish People sewed in the desert to decorate the Tabernacle's colourful curtains. We are thankful for her work. May she rest in peace and for eternity sit at God's feet sewing His holy garments."

The men said Kaddish, then pushed the cart out of the cemetery. The old Jewish woman's soul went to heaven.

The next day came, as it always does, and the German soldier moved into the old woman's home. He picked up an ornately designed sewing box, opened a window and dumped the contents into the street.

On Yom Hashoah remember the Jewish people and all peoples murdered by the Nazis – those who had no family, and those who sewed.

"No one yet knows what awaits the Jews in the 21st century, but we must make every effort to ensure that it is better than what befell them in the 20th, the century of the Holocaust." -Benjamin Netanyahu

Sports Reporter Dies

TORONTO — Toronto Star sportswriter Randy Starkman, the country's leading print reporter on amateur athletics, died April 16 in Toronto of pneumonia. He was 51. He took ill earlier this month after returning from covering the Canadian Olympic swim trials in Montreal. Starkman covered 12 Olympic Games and won two National Newspaper Awards. In 1993, he also exposed disgraced sprinter Ben Johnson's second positive steroid test. He is survived by his wife, CBC Radio host Mary Hynes, and his teenaged daughter, Ella.

WORLD

Painting Returned

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — A painting stolen from its Italian Jewish owner and sold by France's Vichy government was returned to his heirs last week. Christ Carrying the Cross Dragged by a Rogue, a 16th-century work by Girolamo de' Romani, is going back to the heirs of Federico Gentili di Giuseppe, who owned the painting until he died in France in 1940. In February, a U.S. federal judge ordered that the painting be returned to his grandchildren, who filed a lawsuit in 1997 to have the painting and others restored to them. The heirs intend to auction off the work, estimated to be worth $3.5 million. It was seized last November by U.S. officials from the Mary Brogan Museum of Art and Science in Tallahassee, where it was on display with 50 works on loan from the Pinacoteca di Brera Museum in Milan, Italy.

Adelson Donates

LAS VEGAS — Casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, a major giver to Newt Gingrich's presidential bid, has donated $5 million to a super political action committee that backs Republican candidates. The billionaire Adelson and his wife, Miriam, made the gift in February to the Congressional Leadership Fund, a super PAC linked to U.S. House of Representative Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) that supports establishment Republican candidates, Politico reported, citing a newly filed campaign finance report. Adelson also reportedly hosted a fundraiser April 20 at one of his Las Vegas hotels for a Boehner umbrella group that works closely with the Republican National Committee. The donation is a positive sign for Republican frontrunner Mitt Romney, because his campaign is hoping to attract wealthy donors of GOP presidential hopefuls he appears to have beaten.

Arab MK Tests Israeli Boycott Ban

Ahmad Tibi

OTTAWA — An Arab-Israeli member of Israel's Knesset appears to have contravened an Israeli law by calling on Canadians to boycott Israel.

Ahmad Tibi, deputy speaker of the Knesset, called for a boycott of firms and products linked to Israeli towns in the West Bank and other disputed territory, Postmedia News reported.

During a visit to Ottawa last week, Tibi tested the Boycott Law, which came into force in Israel last July and allows civil actions against those who encourage boycotts against the Jewish state.

"I said that I am willing to test this immoral law trying to prevent me, as a member of the parliament, from expressing my views against the settlements in a peaceful way," Tibi said.

Jewish settlements in the West Bank "are a cancer spreading all over Palestinian land, and cancer should be treated and eradicated," he said. "I am talking about a peaceful and non-violent way by not buying or selling or dealing in these products from these settlements."

Tibi said Canada's pro-Israel government "is not willing to differentiate between… products coming from settlements and products coming from Israel."

The Jerusalem Post reported that the next morning, Israel Beiteinu Anglos, the English arm of the nationalist Israeli political party, began a social media campaign against him on Facebook.

New defence attaché eager to build bridges

First such posting to Canada from Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Another layer has been added to the ever-deepening bilateral relationship between Canada and Israel.

Last December, Israel quietly named Brig.-Gen (Res.) Eden Attias as its first Ministry of Defence attaché to Ottawa. Prior to that, Israel's only defence attaché in North America was stationed in Washington, D.C.

Given the deepening ties and friendship between Canada and Israel, the moment was right for his new post to be created, Attias said.

"Due to the flourishing relationship between Canada and Israel, one of the recent discussions between our defence ministries involved looking for ways to get more people on the ground in each country. We have a lot of things we're sharing," he said.

In his first full interview with the media since taking up his post, Attias, 45, told The CJN last week that he's eager to begin making contacts across the country, as well as to promote Israel's interests to Canadians, and vice versa.

"I'm here as a two-way servant: at once a representative of the Israeli military and of the Israeli people," he said while on a two-day visit to Toronto last Thursday and Friday.

Eden Attias
[Asaf Geva photo]

While in the city, he gave a briefing to staff at the Canadian Forces College, and he also met with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, among other engagements.

Attias said that he's familiar with Canada, "but to really learn about a country, you have to live it. And that's what I'm here to do."

He noted that while he's maintaining his own mission in Ottawa, he's working closely with Ambassador Miriam Ziv and Israeli embassy staff to promote his country's interests.

While his diplomatic career is in its early stages, Attias has a distinguished military resumé, mostly as a pilot and leader in the IAF.

As a young pilot, he helped with the covert rescue of thousands of Ethiopian Jews who were making the harrowing trek across the desert.

A primer on the Jewish state

From the editor's desk...

Barry Rubin is a straightforward, no nonsense observer and analyst of the Middle East. Never shy, occasionally gruff, Rubin speaks his mind and writes without ambiguities. His research is thorough, his familiarity with the subject matter unassailable.

As the director of the Global Research in International Affairs Center at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, Israel, and as the editor of the Middle East Review of International Affairs Rubin has a perfect perch from which to observe and study quickly unfolding events in the region as well as the punditry from around the world that purports to inform the uninformed and/or curious of the import of those events.

Anyone familiar with Rubin's writing will know that he doesn't mind pointing out, especially to western analysts and journalists who regularly opine on Israel and the myriad conflicts in the Middle East, the flaws in their conclusions. According to Rubin, a great many of the western "experts" just don't get it when it comes to Israel. They are often unfamiliar with the historical background of the peoples in the area and of their cultural differences and are hard-pressed or unwilling to upgrade themselves in the deficient areas for many reasons, not least of which is a failure to speak or read the local languages.

But their lack of sound, substantive grasp of the subject of the State of Israel has never inhibited western journalists and analysts from commenting on any number of aspects concerning the Jewish state. Indeed, Israel and its conflict with the Palestinians are probably two of the most written about subjects in the vast corpus of western journalism and the western blogosphere.

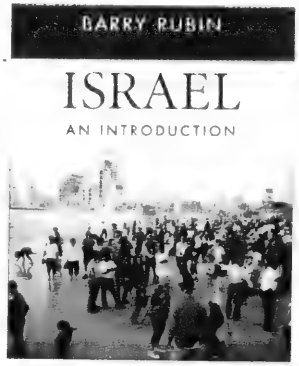
Thus, Rubin has attempted to fill a small part of the large void of ignorance by providing a primer on the modern Jewish state called Israel, An Introduction (Yale University Press, 2012).

In a recent online interview, Rubin explained his purpose in compiling the book. "There has never been a book about the actual country and the real people who live there.

"I say that because there is no country in the world that foreigners think they know more about but really know less about than Israel."

The book is plainly a primer aimed at students and lay readers alike. It is entirely introductory in the scope of the material, compact in style and format (340 pages) and well annotated and footnoted to encourage further reading.

After a broad introductory chapter called Understanding Israel, in which Rubin writes the contextual background of the text, he provides information about Israel according to six categories: history, land and people, society, economics, government and politics, and culture.



The result is a broad picture of the modern Jewish state with the full range of colour expected of a large canvas as well as the wart-like detail that up-close examination yields.

Rubin's book is timely.

It is a form of easily accessible antidote against the poison that Israel's enemies spread about it. Indeed, even as these words are being written, a debate rages among Britain's theatre elite about whether to allow Israeli actors to perform on British stages. Some churches in the United States are once again arguing about divesting their investments from Israel. And so on. The examples are too many, too misconceived and too sad.

In the book's first chapter, Rubin, of course, takes note of the malevolence of Israel's ill wishers. "The demonization of Israel in many countries of the world and certain sectors of the West has little relation to the reality of the country and its people."

And that is why he emphasizes that the reality of the place must be recorded and the deliberate distortions or uninformed misconceptions set to heel.

"Israel is a remarkable success story," Rubin told the interviewer. "We should remember the difficulties it faced in transforming a land without resources, surviving so much hostility and turning a people with many differences and no military or governmental experience into a stable and prosperous democratic nation."

"Though a country imperiled and sometimes reviled," he concludes the introductory chapter, "a nation facing real threats and forced to rely largely on its resources, Israel is not only surviving but flourishing."

That Israel is flourishing is the message that flows from every page in this book. Indeed, it is an excellent message to recall on the 64th anniversary of the creation of this tiny, imperfect, frustrating but marvellous country.

A WORLD OF HONOUR

Israeli President Shimon Peres speaks with Chaya Sachivaschorder, one of a group of outstanding young soldiers rehearsing for a special annual ceremony honouring young soldiers that will take place at the president's residence on Yom Ha'atzmaut. Sachivaschorder's parents and three brothers were killed by a suicide bomber at the Sbarro restaurant in Jerusalem in August 2001. The attack killed 15 people and wounded 130 others.

iVolunteer connects young adults, survivors

There is a new project in Toronto that offers young Jewish professionals an opportunity to take a more active approach in honouring Holocaust survivors and preserving their memories.

iVolunteer, an initiative officially launched April 19 on Yom Hashoah, in partnership with Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP), connects young people with Holocaust survivors.

"The volunteers get an opportunity to hear the stories from the survivors, and they'll be the last generation to hear these stories first hand," said Chayala Zarchi, 26, who is co-directing the project with her husband Rabbi Yudi Zarchi.

Howard Chandler
[David Collin photo]

"Both parties benefit from this program. The survivors enjoy the companionship, they enjoy being around young, vibrant people. A lot of them are lonely. A lot of them do have family but want to participate just because they know how important it is to pass their story on."

Modelled after an initiative that originated in New York City, iVolunteer Toronto's pilot program has produced 10 successful pairings since it started last year.

"It was really just about getting some feedback and seeing how it works... We're very excited to open it up to the public," Zarchi said.

The launch, held at JUMP's Yonge Street centre, attracted more than 100 people who enjoyed a light dinner before learning more about the initiative and hearing the personal testimony of Holocaust survivor Howard Chandler.

Chandler, was born in Poland in 1928. He was a prisoner in Starachowice labour camp, then interned in Auschwitz-Birkenau, Buchenwald and Theresienstadt before his liberation. Howard and his older brother were the only survivors in his family. He came to Canada as a war orphan in 1947.

Zarchi said she was initially inspired to lead such an initiative because of late great-grandfather, a native of Lodz, Poland who was also a Holocaust survivor.

"I've learned so much from being around him. He was the most incredible human being," she said.

"Like the other survivors we've been meeting with, the experiences they've been through and the fact that they were able to start over again and build new families and build a new life is incredible."

The iVolunteer participants meet about twice a month, but Zarchi stressed that the rules as to where, how and when they meet are very lax.

"They can meet in their homes, some of them might meet at a shopping mall, or they'll go out for coffee together – it really depends on what they want," she said.

"We realize that young professionals are busy and we want this to be able to fit into their schedules."

Zarchi, who estimated that there are about 10,000 Holocaust survivors living in the Greater Toronto Area, said she's committed to connecting as many young people with survivors as she can.

"We don't have a lot of time left and there is such an urgency. We really need to take advantage of the time we have left with them."

Jewish solidarity stressed at commemoration

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

Beth Tzedec Congregation's annual Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah community Holocaust commemoration last week focused on Jewish solidarity during the Holocaust.

The Jewish value of "kol Yisrael arevim zeh la-zeh," all Jews are responsible for one another, was stressed during the commemoration, whose theme was "My Brother's Keeper."

Yom Hashoah

"Yes, the individual has to be self-reliant, but survival also depends on arevut, mutual upholding," said the congregation's spiritual leader, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, at the commemoration, which was co-sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

At the event attended by local politicians, Amir Gissin, the consul general of Israel in Toronto, addressed the packed sanctuary. Messages of support were read to the audience from Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty.

Gissin spoke about the concept of Jewish unity and mutual responsibility. "We remember this aspect where there was a need to be together in order to survive," he said.

He said that since the Holocaust, the Jewish People have continued to look out for one another, and that this principle has been one of the founding beliefs of the State of Israel. Israel helped the survivors settle after the Holocaust, brought Mizrachi Jews to safety in the 1950s, and later did the same for Ethiopian and Russian Jews, he said.

Even now, Gissin said, Israel makes an effort to reach out to Jews around the world through shlichim, or emissaries. "We send our youngest, our best to educate and to make sure our young Jewish people in the Diaspora continue to be a part of the togetherness we have created."

There was an emotional candlelighting ceremony in memory of the Holocaust's Jewish victims and Jewish child victims, and in honour of all Holocaust survivors, their future generations, the Righteous Among the Nations and the Allied armed forces, liberators, ghetto fighters and Jewish partisans.

Former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of the State of Israel and chairman of the Yad Vashem Council, Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, addresses the audience at the Beth Tzedec community Holocaust commemoration through a video presentation.

The candlelighting was followed by the singing of the Partisans Song and the keynote address from former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of the State of Israel and chairman of the Yad Vashem Council, Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau. He spoke to the community from Israel through a video presentation.

Rabbi Lau, a survivor himself, spoke of the idea of responsibility for fellow Jews, especially within the family. "On this day of commemoration of the Holocaust, let's pay attention to the brothers and sisters who smuggled themselves into the concentration camps, knowing that in one of the barracks, their younger brother or sister lived," he said. He added that his own brother, like many older siblings during the Holocaust, was asked by their parents to look after him.

As Gissin said in his speech, the Jewish nation has always and must always look after one another, whether biological siblings or simply another Jewish person. "We were, and still are, our brother's keeper."

Panel focuses on righting wrongs of the past

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

Remembrance, reconciliation and restitution were the focus of a Holocaust Remembrance Day panel held by the Law Society of Upper Canada and the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada last week.

The commemoration addressed the question of whether or not it's possible for Canada to right the wrongs of the past, specifically regarding the Canadian government's refusal of entry to Jewish refugees during the Holocaust.

The panel, which took place at the Law Society building in Toronto, began with a viewing of the short documentary When Canada Said No: The Abandoned Jews of the MS St. Louis. The film was created by the National Task Force on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research to be shown in schools. It's about the 937 Jews who left Germany on the MS St. Louis in 1939, only to be refused entry by several countries, including Canada. The passengers were eventually returned to four cities in Europe, where only about half of them survived the war.

Lisa Avedon, one of the MS St. Louis survivors, spoke about her memories on the ship as a young child. "We were very, very lucky," she said of her family. "There were many people from the St. Louis who were not that lucky."

64

It has been 64 years since some 2,000 years of statelessness ended for the Jewish People, since the hopeful, tearful, unceasing yearning across those same 2,000 years for return to Zion became hopeful, tearful, unlimited opportunity for the rebuilding of Zion.

In the history of nations, 64 years is a short span.

But in the history of the State of Israel, that rather modest number is a testament to the resilience, determination and overwhelming strength of its people.

Few, but the most visionary, the most single-minded, the most stubborn of resolve actually believed, 64 years ago, that the state could withstand the fury of violence, bloodshed and war launched against it by the entirety of the Arab world.

"On the feverish night when the British pulled out and we declared the State of Israel, we had no way of knowing what would happen," Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, wrote in his memoirs. "Could our people, ill-prepared as they were, rise to the occasion? I knew they had it in them to do so. I was confident in their fortitude. But materially we were so very badly off."

Despite the dire situation, the 600,000 people of the Yishuv – the Jewish community in newly proclaimed Medinat Yisrael, formerly British Mandatory Palestine – did indeed rise to the occasion.

With the help of Jewish and non-Jewish volunteers from around the world – many of whom had seen active service in World War II, had seen with their own eyes what the Nazis and their abettors had done, and had understood the urgency and the enormity of that particular hour of history 64 years ago – the embattled fighters of the nascent Jewish state repelled and defeated the attempt to destroy their country at its very birth.

Some 64 years ago, Israel became the 59th country to be admitted as a member-state of the United Nations, ahead of 134 other countries that have arrived since.

Sixty-four is a milestone of modern history. It is also a promise to us fulfilled, though we cannot fathom the full dimension of the ethereality of the promise or fully grasp the nature of its fulfilment, still unfolding, ever dependent upon the union of heaven and earth.

Sixty-four represents a statement of loyalty to a cause and to a people. But it is also a statement of purpose binding the people to the land for eternity.

As enshrined so elegantly in its Declaration of Independence, 64 is an aspiration for the Jewish state that "will rest upon foundations of liberty, justice and peace as envisioned by the Prophets of Israel [and will] maintain complete equality of social and political rights for all its citizens without distinction of creed, race or sex."

Celebrate 64 with thanksgiving, gratitude, praise, hope and the words of the Shehecheyanu in our hearts and on our lips.

25 years ago in The CJN

Annette Strauss, 63, a Dallas city councillor for 15 years, became the first Jewish woman to be elected mayor of a Texas city. She was the first female mayor of Dallas and only the second female mayor of a U.S. city, after Dianne Feinstein in San Francisco.

A sombre anniversary

This year's Yom Hashoah is particularly significant to me, as it coincides with the 70th anniversary of the roundup, deportation and mass murder of Slovakian Jewry. Prior to World War II, the Jewish population of the Slovak part of Czechoslovakia constituted a vibrant community of some 90,000 people, including my father's extended family. This was all to change in March 1939, when Slovakia became a new, independent country and loyal Nazi puppet state allied with Nazi Germany. Its president was Jozef Tiso, a Roman Catholic priest, and its prime minister was Vojtech Tuka, both of whom were deeply religious men. Anti-Jewish measures and laws were immediately passed by the new government, and these were carried out and enforced with zeal by the fiercely nationalistic Hlinka Guard.

Beginning in April of 1942, the rounding up and deportation to Auschwitz of Slovakia's Jews began in earnest. Tiso actually paid the Germans 500 Deutschmarks, money stolen from Jewish assets and never repaid by Germany, for every Slovak Jew they would take away. By the end of the war, 83 per cent of Slovakia's Jewish population, or 75,000 innocent Slovak Jewish men, women and children, had been taken to German death camps in Poland and murdered. Among them were my paternal grandparents and numerous aunts, uncles and cousins.

Had the Vatican intervened at the time and reined in Tiso, Slovak Jewry and my relatives might have been saved. If the wartime Pope Pius XII had spoken out against the persecution and killing of Jews, perhaps there would not have been a Holocaust or its scope would have been much smaller. I guess we will never know for sure. Nevertheless, Slovakia will forever have the dubious distinction of being the only country during World War II to have paid Nazi Germany money to deport and murder its Jewish citizens, an unforgettable footnote and indelible stain on its otherwise proud history and heritage.

Canadian Machal volunteers

Army investigators of MIA soldiers from the War of Independence have established that Harvey Cohen and Ed Lugach, two cousins from Toronto, fell at the battle of Malkiyeh ("Yom Hazikaron, 5772," letters, April 19). They were not waylaid by Arab irregulars near Sarafand. That was my speculation, which proved to be erroneous. The army has decided that their remains were found near the battle site, and they now have been interred there, with a stone that marks their burial place.

There was a vigorous and lengthy investigation that left no stone unturned. I worked with the soldiers who conducted the inquiry, and I have nothing but admiration for their creative and unceasing efforts to amass the facts. Worth noting, however, is that the DNA that might have been conclusive was withheld by their Toronto relatives, it would appear.

Misleading credit for CHAT design

I am writing in response to the article "New Vaughan JCC almost ready to open" (April 12). In the article, the design of the adjacent Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto building is attributed to architect Guela Solow-Ruda. I would like to correct this misleading credit for the design. The school was designed by our firm, CS&P Architects, in joint venture with Petroff Architects. As lead architects for the building, I was principal-in-charge from our firm and design principal. Solow-Ruda was design principal from Petroff Architects. CS&P Architects have been honoured to have worked with Tanenbaum CHAT for the past 15 years on both of its campuses and are delighted to be the architects for the new Guttman Family Science Wing on CHAT's Wilmington campus, which will have its groundbreaking next month.

Memory, history and hope for the Jewish People

Rabbi David Hartman

The placing together of Yom Hazikaron – the day of remembrance of those who died fighting for Israel and those who were killed in terror attacks – and Yom Ha'atzmaut – the day of our independence as a state – reveals a profound characteristic of the Israeli psyche and of its value systems.

In the land of the promise, our fundamental connection to this land is based upon memory. This was the first home of the Jewish People, and the sense that there was no other home to replace Israel was a central value in our tradition. No matter how people may want to refer to the exile – either as Diaspora or exilic or homeless – clearly it is difficult to interpret those categories in the modern world for people who live in western cultures such as those of England or the United States. They don't feel they are in exile, they feel very much a part of their respective cultures and environments.

Yet, in some very important way, Israel is a reminder that home in the deepest historical sense – the place that embodies all the values, aspirations and dreams of the prophets – is here.

Jerusalem is the city of memory. To deny our memory is to deny our identity. When former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat wanted to make a distinction between those who came later to Israel and those who came earlier, or suggest that the Temple Mount was never the Jewish Temple Mount, my issue with him was that he had no understanding of Jewish history. He had no understanding of what Jewish identity and memory were about.

There is no difference in whether people come to Israel earlier or later, because the memory of Israel nurtured the soul of all the people no matter where they were. "Next year in Jerusalem" is recited by Jews everywhere during their Passover celebrations.

When you visit a mourner, you say, "Hamakom yinachem etchem" ("May God comfort you amidst the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem"). This was a phrase that came out naturally when people were sitting and mourning.

Or, when you celebrate the wedding of two young people, you sing blessings expressing that God should rejoice over you as a bridegroom does over his bride, and again, "Od yishama b'arei Yehuda," that we may once again hear the voices of lovers of spontaneous joy, of full celebration of life in the cities of Judea.

These types of experiences, in major events such as marriage and death, or in the everyday liturgy of the prayer book and the grace after meals, all developed and nurtured the belief that home is Israel.

So, when we celebrate our independence, we first of all remember. We remember that this state was not established without heroism and sacrifice. We can't approach the joy of independence if we forget the people who gave their lives to make that possible.

And the deep question we ask is to what degree is our celebration a reflection of their deepest aspirations. We owe our existence to them. Our identity is rooted in their experience and in their memory. And, in light of their memory, we celebrate independence.

I lost a son-in-law, and we go on Yom Hazikaron to the military cemetery in Raanana. It is painful to see how crowded it becomes each year. We listen in silence as the siren is blown, and we witness the deepest sighs and pain in the faces of all the people who are there.

Then, a few hours later, we meet the same Jews, and we say, "Chag Samayach." From that period of mourning and tragic pain, we then move to "Chag Samayach," we wish you a joyous festival. Songs of Hallel are recited in the services. Thus we move from tragedy to celebration, pain to the celebration of life, mourning and then the affirmation of life.

We affirm the dignity of our existence only as we feel the memory of those who are not here with us. We cannot celebrate by cutting ourselves off from history. We cannot celebrate unless we feel total solidarity with those who came before us.

For me, it is my son-in-law, Adam, whom I loved so deeply. He was killed as a pilot in the war of Shalom Hagalil (Peace for Galilee) in Lebanon in 1982. I see his face before me always, the joyous eyes, the courage, the celebration of life, the joy he felt in flying to provide security for the Jewish people here. His parents were Auschwitz survivors, and he lived with their memory as well, and he celebrated independence and our rebirth by remembering as well that Jews were willing to undergo great tragedy, suffering and mourning in order to retain their Jewish identity.

Israel makes us visible again in human history. We are not hiding. The Holocaust did not create a running away from our memories. So, we enter Yom Hazikaron, the day of memory, with trepidation. We leave it as we enter into Yom Ha'atzmaut with the celebration of life. The psyche of the Jew moves miraculously from tragedy to celebration.

We don't live only with the memory of the Holocaust, but also with the memory of rebuilding Jerusalem. We say l'chaim, a celebration of life, of the joy of every day, the joy of every minute in which we can see our loved ones and celebrate the joy of friendship and kindness to each other. That ability to celebrate and hope for the future never leaves the Jewish psyche.

If we look like a people that lives with the memory of Auschwitz or the memory of destruction and suffering, that's only one phase of Jewish identity. Only as you grasp the way we move so uniquely from weeping to celebration do you understand in the deepest sense what memory, history and the hope for a better future life mean for the Jewish People.

Rabbi David Hartman is the president emeritus of the Shalom Hartman Institute. This essay was first published by the institute in 2009.

Stamped in memory

When I was a university student in Jerusalem, my great-uncle Binyomin, who had a shul in Boston, mailed me a photograph of a stamp. He asked me to hunt it down for him. Issued in 1962 to commemorate Yom Hashoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day, the stamp featured the words "Shema Yisrael" in graduated shades of orange, in the shape of a flame set against a black background. I found the stamp in a dusty box, amid other alte zachen in the shuk, and bought it for him.

Although I had no philatelic interest and regarded postage stamps as purely utilitarian, it intrigued me that Uncle Binyomin wanted the stamp. I found another one and bought it for myself. The next time a new set of Israeli stamps was issued, I bought them all and began to collect. Dating from my student days, I have an unbroken set of first-day covers and tags.

Lately, I have begun to backfill my collection. With the help of online opportunities for purchase or bid, I have added, for example, a set of pre-state stamps, as well as the first set of stamps issued under statehood. My goal is not to amass a comprehensive set of stamps, but to supplement selectively.

Perhaps not surprising for a professor who deals with Jewish memory, I have a special interest in memorial stamps – those issued to mark Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron, the memorial day for soldiers fallen in Israel's battles. The design, text and frequency of issuance of these stamps and their day of issue envelopes speak to evolving cultural values in Israel, the way the country regards its past and its present.

In the run of stamps in my collection, the Yom Hashoah issues often feature flames or hands raised in fists or stretched out in supplication. One memorable one depicts a hand composed of strips of a tattered tallit. The stamps or their envelopes usually include a biblical verse, such as Eileh ezkerah – these I remember – from Tehillim (Psalms), a phrase ensconced in religious memory as the opening of a powerful poem about martyrology recited on Yom Kippur. Rather than yearly releases, Yom Hashoah issues became more sporadic over time.

Yom Hazikaron stamps appear more regularly. Their designs feature memorial spaces, headstones, stylized accouterments of war (such as tanks) or abstractions. Rarely do they invoke biblical verses. Instead, they may include verses of modern Israeli poetry, such as Haim Gouri's poem about Bab el-Wad. And while the texts of the Yom Hashoah stamps are always translated into English, sometimes those on the Yom Hazikaron stamps appear only in Hebrew.

What do these differences say about cultural memory in Israel? Clearly, both days anchor sets of memories that are important to Israeli self-definition. The bilingualism of

Sara R. Horowitz

in Toronto

the Yom Hashoah stamp speaks to a history shared by all Jews – thus, the texts appear in the languages of the two largest Jewish postwar populations. In recent years, Holocaust-related stamps are sometimes not explicitly linked to Yom Hashoah and may expand beyond the framework of Jewish memory – for example, to the January UN Holocaust Remembrance.

The Yom Hazikaron stamp, by contrast, insists on the Israeliness of memory. The secular texts, primacy of Hebrew and regularity of issue point to a commemoration of losses embedded not only in the country's origin, but – sadly – in its present. That is to say, on Yom Hazikaron, Israelis mourn not only their ancestors – real and spiritual – but their neighbours, their friends and, most tragically, their children. I'm not suggesting that these losses matter only to Israelis, and not to Jews more broadly, but that Israelis, of necessity, feel them most acutely and intimately.

It's no disrespect to commemoration to yearn for a future in which these losses have faded into the past and become historical, truly a memory and not a lived present.

As Yom Hazikaron melts into Yom Ha'atzmaut, Independence Day, and we celebrate the enduring miracle that is Israel, I spread out before me the decades' accumulation of stamps. Taken together, they celebrate architecture and art, science and literature, sages and mystics, the beauty of text and the beauty of the land.

The Diaspora is here to stay

This issue of The CJN appears on Yom Ha'atzmaut, when there's hardly a Jewish community in the world that doesn't mark Israeli Independence Day in one way or another. The anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel has rightly become part of both our national and our religious calendars.

But that's not enough for A.B. Yehoshua, one of the most important writers and public figures in contemporary Israel. For him, Diaspora existence – now that we have a Jewish state – is vacuous and neurotic.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

He insists that if you want to be a complete, not a partial, Jew you must live in Israel, not just celebrate if from afar. He has spoken about it for decades, most recently last month in Jerusalem. To live outside of Israel today is for him "a very deep failure of the Jewish people."

Though nobody is making aliyah on the strength of this or any other speech, many Jews in the Diaspora seem to enjoy the flagellation, especially when it comes from a distinguished Israeli. That's why we keep inviting Yehoshua to our communities to tell us off at well-attended events. Perhaps deep down we suspect that he's right. Not that we intend to do much about it, but maybe we think that a well crafted moralizing talk is good for the fractured Jewish Diaspora soul.

Having now lived both in Jerusalem and in Toronto for more than a decade, I feel moved to react to the admonition – but not to agree with it.

I love being in Israel. My Judaism is particularly enriched by Jerusalem and what it represents. But I also know that much of the tradition to which I'm committed has been shaped elsewhere.

Jewish history is primarily Diaspora history. Israel's Declaration of Independence, which we recall this day with pride and joy, is misleading when it states that "Eretz Yisrael was the birthplace of the Jewish People." It's not even certain that it's there that our "spiritual, religious and national identity was formed." Scripture and history indicate that we've been shaped by the gift of Torah starting in the desert – in no-man's land.

Therefore, although I'm a long-term, card-carrying Zionist, I cannot agree that our choice as Jews is either Israel or extinction. Whether or not individuals decide to live in Israel or remain in the Diaspora, as a people we belong to both, even if sometimes our enemies around the world try to get rid of us.

Jewish existence has always been precarious. Even the establishment of the State of Israel, although essential for our survival after the Holocaust, doesn't guarantee our future. The legitimate nervousness of Israelis in the light of Iran's nuclear ambitions is a telling indication of fears of what might happen to Jews living in their homeland, despite the stress on security and preventive action, and despite the rhetoric and the bravado of politicians and generals.

In that struggle, as in much else, the presence of vibrant and influential Jewish communities, around the world no less than in the United States, is an asset that Israel cannot do without.

Even more significantly, the nature of Judaism itself is to this very day shaped as much by the Diaspora as it is by Israel. Unlike Yehoshua and his supporters, many thoughtful Israelis have come to recognize it and are paying great attention to what's happening in the Jewish world. Though some only point to anti-semitism abroad, most affirm the continued vitality of Jewish life outside the Jewish state. They've come to respect the Diaspora far beyond its fundraising potential.

They recognize that what's needed in our time is a creative fusion, indeed a creative tension, between Israel and the Diaspora. Much of contemporary Zionist thought and practice is engaged in this work.

It's nowadays also prepared to integrate critical Jewish voices abroad as part of the ongoing debate. Thus critical American J-Street and related organizations around the world are gaining legitimacy as members of the collective Jewish enterprise with Israel at its centre.

All this bodes well for the future. Jews everywhere will continue to be enriched by the writings of Yehoshua and his Israeli peers, yet ignore his indictment of them as partial Jews for not heeding his call to move to Israel.

Independence Day is a splendid opportunity to celebrate this Israel-Diaspora partnership.

The clock ticks as talks on Iran take place

The first discussions in 15 months focusing on Iran's highly contentious nuclear program produced two sharply divergent assessments of the outcome.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu expressed skepticism, suggesting that Iran had engaged in deception and was brazenly trying to buy yet more time. By contrast, Iran's chief negotiator, Saeed Jalili, called the talks "very successful."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Iranian perception was supported by the United States, Israel's ally, which characterized the negotiations as "a positive first step," and by the European Union's foreign minister, Catherine Ashton, who described them as "constructive and useful" and disclosed that the next round would be held in Baghdad on May 23.

The third set of negotiations with Iran in three years brought the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council – United States, Russia, China, Britain and France – plus Germany to Istanbul, Turkey, on April 14 to discuss two basic topics: Iran's uranium enrichment activities, a key component of its controversial nuclear program, and Iran's need to fully co-operate with the International Atomic Energy Agency.

As the talks got under way, the atmosphere was tense and the level of mutual mistrust was high, even as western diplomats told reporters that Iran had shown "serious engagement" on major issues.

There was, of course, a clear understanding in both camps that failure might impel the United States and particularly Israel to launch an attack on Iran's nuclear facilities. Last week, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said that the talks risked wasting time and that Israel had not promised the United States not to attack Iran while they were taking place.

U.S. President Barack Obama categorized the talks as Iran's "last chance" to resolve the dispute through diplomatic means. U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was just as emphatic, warning Iran that Washington would not tolerate any further foot-dragging or prevarication. Backing up its rhetoric with military might, the United States dispatched a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf, which Iran has threatened to close in the event of war.

In a message to Israel, Clinton asserted that a pre-emptive Israeli strike on Iran would not be "in anyone's interest." China and Russia – which have extensive commercial relations with Iran and take a far more conciliatory approach to its nuclear program – put out similar declarations. The host of the talks, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, warned that an Israeli strike on Iran would be "disastrous" and devastate the Middle East.

Iran, in keeping with past pronouncements, claimed that its nuclear program is peaceful in nature and designed to produce energy and medical isotopes. To underscore its claim, Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, issued a fatwa against the acquisition of nuclear weapons, saying they contravene the principles of Islam.

Striking a skeptical tone, the six powers observed that Iran's success in enriching a portion of its stockpile of uranium to 20 per cent purity, just a few technical steps away from bomb grade, aroused suspicion.

The Obama administration, having promised Israel it will not tolerate an Iranian nuclear arsenal, delivered something of an ultimatum to Iran on the eve of the talks. Washington insisted that Iran must dismantle a newly built facility in Fordo (from which IAEA inspectors are barred), halt the production of uranium fuel and ship stockpiles of 20 per cent enriched uranium out of the country.

Israel, watching these developments warily, presented still more stringent demands. Two weeks before the talks were to convene, Defence Minister Ehud Barak made several demands: Iran must transfer 20 per cent enriched uranium to a third-party country, ship the majority of low-enriched uranium out of Iran, leaving just enough to generate electricity, and close the Fordo facility altogether.

Netanyahu was even blunter. In a meeting with Italian Prime Minister Mario Monti, he demanded a complete cessation of all uranium enrichment by Iran. Swiftly rejecting Israel's conditions, Iran went to Istanbul with several objectives in mind.

Primarily, Tehran wants United Nations and western sanctions to be lifted or at least eased, since they have badly damaged Iran's economy. The sanctions have disrupted Iran's banking system, increased inflation, decreased the value of its currency and affected oil exports, which account for 80 per cent of its foreign revenue. As well, Tehran seeks United Nations acknowledgement of its right to pursue peaceful nuclear technology.

Iranian Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Salehi

In a public relations blitz preceding the talks, Iran displayed a mixture of bravado, defiance and conciliation. Declaring he would never surrender Iran's nuclear rights, President Mahmud Ahmadinejad claimed that Iran could ride out the sanctions, thanks to its huge reserve of foreign currency holdings. But in a nod to diplomacy, he promised that Iran would present "new initiatives" in Turkey.

A week before the talks got underway, Iran cut off oil exports to Germany, Spain and Greece in retaliation for an EU oil embargo due to go into effect on July 1. And in a show of bluster, the commanding officer of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards, Mohammed Pakpour, professed not to be worried by the prospect of an attack on its nuclear sites. "No country dares attack Iran," he said, repeating a mantra that Iran's leadership has self-confidently conveyed.

When the talks ended, Netanyahu voiced disappointment. "My initial impression is that Iran has been given a freebie," he remarked, saying that Iran had been handed a five-week reprieve to upgrade its nuclear program and strengthen its defences.

Since the last round of talks more than a year ago, Iran has made significant advances in enriching uranium, having placed many more centrifuges in the well-protected facility in Fordo.

Cyber warfare, sabotage and the assassination of Iranian scientists have set back but not incapacitated Iran's nuclear program.

After the talks, Iranian Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Salehi portrayed them as "a turning point" in Iran's "dialogue" with the west and proclaimed that Iran is ready to resolve all nuclear issues in the next round in Baghdad, provided sanctions are eased.

Delivering a far different message, Obama warned Iran that "the clock is ticking" and that further sanctions will be applied should there be no breakthrough in Baghdad.

If Iran is merely playing games, which well might be the case, Israel will be sorely tempted to resort to military force, an option that has divided the Israeli elite.

Two months ago, Netanyahu warned Iran that an attack may be imminent. More recently, Barak said that Israel's patience should not be tested. As he grimly stated, "It [an attack] is not needed within weeks, but it is also not something that can wait a number of years."

Judging by these comments, the pressure is on Iran to make considerable concessions in Baghdad next month.

Megillat Hashoah reading draws hundreds

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

More than 300 people gathered at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue last week for the ninth annual commemoration and reading of the Megillat Hashoah in honour of Yom Hashoah and the six million Jews who were murdered during the Holocaust.

The Megillat Hashoah, or Scroll of the Holocaust, was first recited in Toronto in 2003 after it was written by Avigdor Shinan, a professor of Hebrew literature at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, and an academic committee.

Alex Eisen, a Toronto-based Holocaust survivor and Beth David member, is credited with pushing the initiative forward, as he felt that a liturgical megillah would ensure that the memory of the Holocaust would live on forever, even after the last Holocaust survivors pass on.

The ceremony began with an opening prayer recited in Hebrew by Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation, which was repeated by the congregation, who were following along in the megillah, in English.

Each of the six chapters of the scroll were read by members of Beth David – some reading in Hebrew, some in English.

Each chapter was followed by the lighting of a candle, one each in honour of the six million murdered Jews, the destroyed communities, the 1-1/2 million murdered children, the ghetto fighters and partisans, the State of Israel, and the Righteous Among the Nations.

Throughout the ceremony, which had some attendees wiping away tears, violinist Joseph Peleg and pianist Judith Peleg performed hauntingly beautiful musical selections, and the Renanim Youth Choir sang Eli Eli, Hashem Roi, and a prayer for the State of Israel in perfect harmony.

Cantor Marshall Loomer of Beth David and Rabbi Moshe Meirovich of the Lodzer Centre Congregation also led the congregation in prayer and song.

But perhaps the most moving aspect of the ceremony was the reading of the megillah itself, which contains testimony from a Christian journalist who witnessed the horror of a ghetto being liquidated; an account from a concentration camp prisoner who desperately and secretly scribbled her plight on scraps of paper and wedged them between the wooden beds of her barracks, and the last words of a survivor who said he was blessed "to have been born four times, and died twice."

Attendees at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue stand for the national anthem sung before the reading of the Megillat Hashoah.

Not Just Anyone Can Prepare US Tax Returns for a Fee

Jeffrey Brown,
KPMG Tax Partner

If you're living in Canada and you have US tax reporting obligations, you should be aware that, under strict Internal Revenue Service (IRS) rules, only certain qualified individuals may prepare US tax returns for a fee. As the rules have recently changed and are evolving, a person who was able to prepare your US tax returns in the past may not be able to do so now or in the future.

Paid preparers of most US tax returns must first obtain a preparer tax identification number (PTIN) from the IRS. With few exceptions, only a US attorney, a licensed certified public accountant (CPA), an enrolled agent who is qualified to practice before the IRS, and a registered tax return preparer can obtain a PTIN. PTINs must be renewed each year. Until April 18, 2012, paid preparers who do not have a qualifying US designation can obtain a provisional PTIN from the IRS but this provisional PTIN will only be good until December 31, 2013. It is a violation of IRS rules to prepare a US tax return for a fee but not sign the return as a paid preparer.

A licensed CPA is a person who has passed the Uniform CPA examination and satisfied minimum experience and education requirements which vary by state. A dwindling number of states will award a CPA designation upon passing the CPA examination without meeting the experience and education requirements. These persons are not considered licensed CPAs for purposes of obtaining a PTIN or practicing before the IRS.

Non-US professionals such as Canadian attorneys, chartered accountants, certified general accountants, and certified management accountants can obtain a PTIN but may first have to obtain a qualifying US designation such as a licensed CPA or pass certain IRS competency examinations and satisfy continuing education requirements. However, they may still have limited abilities to practise before the IRS.

KPMG can prepare US tax returns for individuals and businesses in Canada who have US tax filing obligations. More than 200 of KPMG's US tax professionals, including many US-trained and licensed CPAs and attorneys, provide services in Canada's largest Jewish communities including Toronto, North York, Hamilton, Ottawa, Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

For more information about how KPMG can help you with your US tax filing obligations, please contact Jeffrey Brown*, KPMG Tax Partner, at 905-523-2226.*

Children's Aid gets a Spark

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Children's Aid Foundation hosts the Spark Gala on May 6, a fundraising event to support disadvantaged children and youth.

Mark Daniels and Andrea Weissman-Daniels founded the Ignite the Spark Fund and created the inaugural Spark Gala last year, inspired by their own experience with their adopted daughter.

Proceeds from the event will give youth in child welfare opportunities to explore their interests and change their lives. Sports, arts and cultural programs are crucial to their personal growth and development, but are a rare experience for most.

This year's theme, Rhythm & Soul, dramatizes the transformative power of music in the life of a child. More than 400 guests, including teenagers, will gather to celebrate at The Carlu in Toronto (444 Yonge St, 7th floor). They will hear from five luminaries who will pay tribute to people who first ignited their inner spark. They are legendary guitarist, songwriter, performer and producer Randy Bachman; figure-skating champion Patrick Chan; Fashion magazine's editor-in-chief Bernadette Morra; actor and Top Chef Canada host Lisa Ray; acclaimed gospel, jazz and blues singer Jackie Richardson.

Hosted by Leslie Roberts and Anne Mroczkowski, co-anchors of the News Hour at 5:30 on Global Toronto, the event begins at 11:30 a.m., followed by an elegant brunch created by celebrity chef Mark McEwen. At 2 p.m. the tribute honouring Spark luminaries begins, highlighting their remarkable success stories through video, song, dance and fashion-runway segments. With musical direction by Joe Sealy, the production includes performances by Sistema Toronto and Sanskriti Arts, among others.

Tickets to the 2012 Spark Gala are $250. Tables and corporate packages are also available. For tickets or more information, call David Grieco at 416-923-0924, ext. 275, or visit www.ignitethespark.ca.

MS St. Louis survivor Lisa Avedon and the chair of the National Task Force on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research, Alain Goldschläger, address the audience at the recent Holocaust Remembrance Day panel. [Michelle Bitran photo]

'Tragedy and hope often go hand in hand'

After watching the story of Canada's refusal to save Jewish refugees, the question of reconciliation was raised to the panellists. "My first reaction... is that there is no way to right the wrongs of the Holocaust," said David Matas, an international human rights lawyer and the senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada.

Matas was on the panel along with Mario Silva, incoming Canadian chair of the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research (ITF); Anke Kausch, an independent provenance researcher for art that changed hands during the Nazi era; Barry Sookman, one of Canada's best known intellectual property lawyers and a partner at McCarthy Tétraut in Toronto.

Matas said that while the crimes of the Holocaust cannot be reconciled, Canadian citizens can be reconciled with their country and its government after its shameful behaviour during the Holocaust.

He suggested that the best way to do this would be to properly deal with Nazi war criminals in Canada, to make public archival information about Nazi war criminals and about humanitarian Raoul Wallenberg, to create more effective hate-speech legislation, to enhance the protection of refugees and to maintain strong support for the State of Israel.

If these changes take place, Matas said, "we can say that the Canada that existed in World War II is not the Canada that exists now, and we can be reconciled."

Sookman added that Canadian copyright law offers "unique opportunities" that could make it easier to share important documents related to the Holocaust and "enable us to play a leadership role in remembrance."

For Kausch, the focus was on art in the Nazi era, rather than documents. She participated in the Nazi-era provenance research program at the National Gallery of Canada from 2007 to 2009, tracking down the ownership history of certain paintings that changed hands between 1933 and 1945 to see if any had ended up in the gallery unrightfully.

She was able to trace the roots of many works of art before the program ran out of funding, but there are still many left to research. Kausch has since proposed the establishment of a Canadian centre for provenance research, so that any art with questionable ownership history can be researched and, if necessary, returned to its rightful owners.

Although the funding for such a centre doesn't yet exist, Silva pointed out that many Holocaust remembrance initiatives have been developed in Canada in recent years. He mentioned the establishment of Holocaust Memorial Day and the sculpture erected in Halifax in memorial of the Jews on the MS St. Louis, as well as Canada becoming the 2013 chair for the ITF.

Silva said that as long as we continue to remember and educate about the horrors of the Holocaust, we can continue to hope for the future. "Tragedy and hope often go hand in hand."

Wiesenthal's life, legacy comes alive on stage

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

It was a day of extreme sadness, emotional stress and tears fitting the solemnity of Yom Hashoah.

But that didn't stop American-born, award-winning actor Tom Dugan from using a delicate brand of humour in an engaging and eloquent performance that depicted a man who dedicated his life to seeking information and tracking down fugitive war criminals.

Dugan was Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal.

An Irish Catholic son of a decorated U.S. soldier who helped liberate Buchenwald, one of the largest concentration camps in Germany in 1945, Dugan had an interest in history and the horrors of death camps.

Now 51 years old, Dugan didn't hesitate when the opportunity came to write a two-hour script and then perform the role of the Austrian-born Holocaust survivor in the play, Nazi Hunter – Simon Wiesenthal.

After a morning performance at the Toronto Centre for the Arts before some 500 Grade 7 to 12 students from schools across Ontario, Dugan was brilliant again for an evening crowd that included survivors and children of survivors.

Sponsored by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, the production used a stage that simulates the infamous Jewish Documentation Center in Vienna. The setting was Wiesenthal's retirement day, and he recalled stories in a masterful solo performance, with wit, humour and brilliant acting.

Dugan recounted the story of Wiesenthal and how he cheated death while being tormented by Hitler's SS, and then dedicated his life to bringing to justice many mass murderers. While packing up his files in 2003, Dugan gives a remarkable depiction of Wiesenthal and his stories before he left the war behind and his office material boxed and ready for transportation to a Los Angeles museum.

"Although progress has been made since those horrible days of the Nazis, there is work still to be done, and I felt an obligation to pass on the important lessons learned from the generations of the past," Dugan said in an exclusive interview with The Canadian Jewish News.

"I would never have written this show if Wiesenthal didn't have a magnificent sense of humour – he was a comic before the war," Dugan said. "It had to be made in a presentation style that was palatable and entertaining, to conquer a tough subject.

"Look, some people thought this would be a drag – long, boring, same old stuff. While humour really works with young crowds, the subject had to be broached in a way that didn't turn people off, but got people to absorb the message."

To become a Wiesenthal look-alike, Dugan had to add padding that would make him look 50 pounds heavier. It also meant shaving part of his full head of hair to resemble Wiesenthal's baldness and then studying with a dialect coach to match his Austrian accent.

"This is not a play about history, it's a play about now and tomorrow. Humanity is struggling now with the things that happened in the '30s and '40s, and we need to do everything possible to make sure this doesn't happen again," Dugan said.

"There were something like 22,000 criminals, and I helped catch 1,100, about five per cent," Dugan said in the performance. "I'm ashamed of that small number."

Dugan had several lines that sparked mixed reaction.

"Austria is a beautiful place, the skiing is great, but they don't mention how many Jews were killed there." And, "They called me the Jewish James Bond," or, "I like it when one Nazi tells another – I will tell Simon Wiesenthal about you."

Helena Fine

Eden Granovsky, a 10-year-old student at the Toronto Heschel School, thought Dugan's decision to use humour was a smart move.

"[The humour] kept me engaged and not feeling so sad," Eden said. " It was like finding a treasure of valuable knowledge that added to what I know about the Holocaust."

Max Abrams, also 10, had a similar reaction. "Thought it was outstanding and very touching," he said. "I now have a better understanding of what my grandfather went through."

And Czech-born Helena Fine, the recipient of a special award from the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre before the performance, gave it a thumbs-up.

"It was a wonderful performance with moments that I got to know Wiesenthal much more than I had known," said Fine, whose mother was a Holocaust survivor. "The message is to learn and keep educating the young. Life goes on, and I don't think we should continue to be so sombre."

Yet, 83-year old Alexander Eisen, who escaped the Budapest ghetto and went on to write a book of his memoirs called A Time of Fear, said, "I respect [Dugan's] artistic talent, but I would have appreciated more of a historical speech, more of a serious theatrical performance. I didn't laugh. I survived the Holocaust."

New names added to most-wanted Nazi list

JTA

The Simon Wiesenthal Center's latest list of the world's 10 most-wanted Nazi war criminals contains three new names, all with Canadian connections, and the centre claims to have new evidence against one of them.

The new names contained in the SWC's Annual Status Report on the Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals replace three alleged Nazi war criminals who died over the past year. The report was released April 18.

Jewish Toronto says goodbye to a "Gute Neshame"

Janice Freedman's tragic passing leaves a wide circle of grief

By Daniel Horowitz

Janice Freedman z"l, who at just 54, recently passed away, was known and loved for many things, most of all, for being a gute neshame, a good soul.

After bravely battling a lengthy illness, Janice, the beloved wife of Alan, and mother of Hillary, Jason, and Jordan, and survived by her sister Renee Birnbaum and brother Rabbi Vernon Kurtz, succumbed to her illness on April 14th.

Despite an ongoing vocal cord ailment, Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, Janice's shul, spoke glowingly about his late congregant through the voice of the shul's cantor, Marshall Loomer who read the rabbi's heartfelt words at her funeral on April 16th.

"It was so typical of Janice that I should not have been surprised in the least," read Cantor Loomer. "Visiting her a couple of weeks before Pesach, when Janice was so ill, in so much discomfort, and clearly and understandably feeling a bit down because of her prolonged incapacity, it seemed to me, for much of the visit, that I was the patient lying in bed, and Janice, the one sitting on the chair, comforting me. Janice, aware that I was having difficulty in speech, was expending whatever energy she had, reflecting concern for me. It didn't matter that what she was experiencing was a thousand times worse, that her illness and prognosis were far more serious than my issues. My issues, and not her own, were the matter of the hour…Her commitment to Jewish tradition, to synagogue, to community was uncompromising. Her pleasantness, her fundamental goodness, her courage, her determination, will continue, for a very long time to come, to inspire, to instruct, and to help her family and all of us to hope for better days ahead."

The first time I had the pleasure to sit down and chat with Janice was shortly after she began working at > "Her commitment to Jewish tradition, to synagogue, to community was uncompromising"

UJA Federation in September, 2006. It was during our conversation when two things about Janice immediately struck me. One was her love for her family. The other was her love of Israel.

Janice asked if I would be willing to write a story about the Renanim Youth Singers - an award-winning, mixed pluralistic group of teenage singers from around the Greater Toronto Area, led by musical director Susan Michaels. The choir was created to help, develop and enhance the love of Eretz Yisrael and Zionism by performing in galas and by traveling to Israel.

The story was to highlight the group's recent return from their first performance in Israel.

Janice was an active and proud Renanim Board Member

Janice Freedman z"l and an even prouder Renanim parent as her son Jordan, now 19, was one of those talented teens who made the sojourn to the Jewish State as did many of the parents, including, of course, Janice.

One of the Renanim Choir's Israeli performances was for SHALVA – The Association for Mentally & Physically Challenged Children in Israel

"Seeing the kids of Shalva enjoying our children gave every parent such nachas, and filled our hearts with so much pride," a clearly kvelling Janice told me. "Seeing our children perform in Israel, surrounded by so much history and spirituality brought a tear to our eyes."

When word of Janice's untimely death spread, many friends and co-workers wanted to share their thoughts and memories.

"Janice was my administrative assistant for many years, but she was much more than that for me; she was a dear friend," said former UJA Federation lawyer, Mark Anshan. "We had a very special relationship. She was a wonderful support - her dedication, commitment, work ethic set the standard. Janice was an exceptional support to me and I was privileged, in so many ways, to have worked with her. For Janice, her family, friendships and personal relationships was what mattered most. We all can learn from Janice's values which were grounded in the way she lived her life as a Jew. I will miss Janice but I have the kippah she made for me as a constant reminder of our special friendship. I finish these brief words with difficulty in viewing the computer screen through the tears that are flowing."

"Janice and I first worked together in the mid 1980's," said Stephanie Olin Chapman, a close friend of Janice's. "Later, I was fortunate enough to be able to offer her a job as the office manager and director of tenant programming at the Kehilla Residential Programme, where I was the Executive Director. She was a key member of the staff that grew that organization. On top of bringing a new sense of order to all of the staff's lives, her work raised the bar for everything that Kehilla would go on to do. Janice was one of the most competent people I ever had the honour of working with and on top of that – a caring and wonderful friend."

> "For Janice, her family, friendships and personal relationships were what mattered most"

"Janice was one of the most committed members of our staff," said Jeff Springer, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President, Corporate Affairs. "She always went the extra mile in helping UJA Federation make a difference to the community she cared so deeply about. I will miss her a great deal."

Janice with son Jordan

"Janice Freedman will be missed but never forgotten by all of us," said UJA Federation President & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "Through her efforts here Janice had the opportunity to make a difference in the Jewish world and she worked every day to do just that. She was a tireless worker with a great presence who touched everyone that she came into contact with on a daily basis, and those people are rare."

Yom Ha-Apps-maut

Israel is turning 64, and with Yom Ha'atzmaut upon us, it's the perfect time to celebrate with some made-in-Israel apps that share the best the country has to offer. Here's a selection, most of which you can download free.

Infolive.tv: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu speaking Mandarin? That what I heard when I first fired up this app, which presents Israeli stories that may have been missed by the world media. Like: the opera Carmen performed at Masada set in the Wild West and Netanyahu's greetings for the Chinese New Year. (Note: After downloading, change settings for this app from French to English.) [http://bit.ly/israpp1]

Ha'aretz, Jerusalem Post and Israel Hayom: The first two provide plenty of news and opinion in English about Israel and the Jewish world. The newly released Ha'aretz app requires a one-time registration. Both apps are free. [http://bit.ly/israpp2], [http://bit.ly/israpp3]. Even if you don't speak Hebrew, it's worth checking out Israel Hayom, which provides a gorgeous newspaper-like interface on your iPad that includes great graphics, screaming headlines and all the ads. [http://bit.ly/israpp4]

Israel Museum: Jerusalem's Israel Museum has recently gone through a renewal, and this app is worth downloading even if you don't have a chance to visit in the near future. The highlight is the Exhibits section, which includes photos and audio commentaries about some of the museum's most prized pieces, including the Rothschild Miscellany, Robert Indiana's Ahava (Love) and the Model of Jerusalem (formerly at the Holyland Hotel). [http://bit.ly/israpp5]

iTsimer: If you are planning a trip to Israel and want to do things a bit differently, consider spending time in a bed and breakfast. The Hebrew app includes photos, reviews and contact information for dozens of gorgeous "tzimmers" in the Upper and Western Galilee and in the Golan Heights. [http://bit.ly/israpp6]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Israel Nature Trails ($2.99): A great guide to download on an iPhone with information about picturesque trails throughout the country. Includes background about each trail and a photo gallery. I particularly like the GPS-enabled maps that will guide you along each path. [http://bit.ly/israpp7]

Israel Football: If you need a break from the Stanley Cup playoffs (and you can read Hebrew), check this app for the latest news about the sport that keeps Israelis glued to their TVs. Can the soccer team from Kiryat Shmonah make it two years in a row? [http://bit.ly/israpp8]

Finally, some of the best apps coming out of Israel aren't about Israel but just demonstrate why Israeli know-how and ingenuity are popular around the world. This article from israel21c.org includes an overview of 10 top Israeli apps, including Waze, which analyzes traffic in real-time and suggests alternative routes to keep you out of a jam. [http://bit.ly/israpp9]

But my real admiration goes to the folks who participated in the recent "Hackathon," where Israeli entrepreneurs brainstormed for two days and at the end had several ideas up and running, including "2See Israel," an aggregator of photos of Israel found on Flickr and Picasaweb [http://bit.ly/israpp10] and "Peace Connector," which uses Facebook "to connect people in countries of conflict simply based on shared hobbies." [http://bit.ly/israpp11]

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

> "In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
> The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
> Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Speaking of 'my rabbi'

As a child, I would accompany my parents each erev Pesach to deliver a bottle of wine to our rabbi. This year, as we ate our final bit of chametz, my rabbi left a message on my cellphone wishing us Chag Samayach.

The role of the rabbi has changed.

I read with great interest the columns by Rabbis Elyse Goldstein (March 8) and Dow Marmur (March 29), as they reflected on the life of Rabbi Gunther Plaut.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Rabbi Goldstein asks, "Who would you consider a giant who can stand in the shadow that Rabbi Plaut cast?" and Rabbi Marmur responds, "I believe that the time when rabbis cast shadows has passed."

Pulpit rabbis like Rabbi Plaut were once the academic scholars of Judaism, but with the proliferation of university Jewish studies programs, that role has shifted. Rabbis were once the primary educators of our community, but with graduate level programs in Jewish education, day and supplementary schools now demand new levels of pedagogic training.

As Rabbi Marmur describes, the rabbi once sat atop the hierarchical pyramid of religious life, holding power by virtue of position and title. This is no longer the case. Religious life has moved from the vertical to the horizontal. My rabbi does not sit next to the Ark facing the congregation but has a seat among the congregants. He shares his pulpit with scholars and congregants, and he refers to himself by his first name.

To me, these changes have fortified, not diminished, my rabbi's authority. My rabbi holds authority, not because of his title or position, but because I choose to invest authority in him, and I make this decision because of his authentic application of his knowledge and himself. My rabbi is a teacher just as he is a community organizer; he shepherds us through lifecycle events just as he builds community; he offers pastoral care just as he calls us before the holidays. My relationship with my rabbi is not one of reverence or awe, but one of warmth and mutual admiration.

I recognize, however, that my use of the term "my rabbi" is rare among my generation. I lament that few feel a personal connection to a rabbi. For most, "my rabbi" refers to the rabbi of the synagogue to which they pay dues, or the rabbi of the congregation where they had their bat mitzvah 20 years ago. It refers to a position rather than a person.

The rabbi as preacher, who captivates audiences and compels attendance and religiosity through sermons and teachings, has passed his prime. Today's rabbi is a community organizer who shares authentically of himself and connects to the personal life journey of his congregants both sociologically and theologically.

The rabbi who seeks to cast a shadow has been rejected by my generation. The rabbi can no longer be a stand-alone figure, separated by title and pulpit. Today's rabbi must work together with the community to shed light on the possibilities of Jewish life. It is only through this collaborative process that more of my peers will be able to speak of "my rabbi."

Federation fosters Russian leaders

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A UJA Federation of Greater Toronto program to foster leadership among local Russian Jews was created in part to address a disconnect between Russian-speaking Jews here – who number between 40,000 and 60,000 – and the wider Jewish community.

Historically, the two groups have not been well integrated, according to Marina Morgenshtern, co-ordinator of the Bridges program, which began in March 2011 and will wind up in June of this year.

What makes the program unique is that the bridges extend in both directions, not just toward Russian speakers, said Morgenshtern, a native of Ukraine whose family immigrated to Israel in 1990 when she was 19. She came to Canada in 2004.

"The traditional understanding of integration is that the newcomers eventually become like [the established community], but we are talking about some kind of cross-fertilization and cross-interest," she said.

One of the important outcomes so far is that the programs' mentors are discovering that the social and cultural Judaism of the newcomers is "different" rather than "less," she said.

Participants learn about goals of leadership, leadership in Jewish history, leadership skills and the importance of philanthropy. They also meet with mentors and other community leaders, and serve as interns on federation committees.

Galina Sandler, 50, who immigrated from Kiev to Toronto with her family at age 15, said her integration into the Jewish community was "pretty painless on an individual basis." She attended high school here, studied history at the University of Toronto (specializing in Russian and eastern European studies), and married a Canadian Jew.

Her children are Canadian-born, and she has worked in jewelry design and product development for many years. At the same time, she believes there's a "gap."

In North America, "the Jewish historical narrative is missing the Soviet period," Sandler said.

"Our lives in the Soviet Union developed differently than North American Jews who had the fortune to be born here… A lot happened from 1917 until the Jews started leaving [the FSU] in the 1970s. Even though religious symbols disappeared and Jewish religious life was gone, and there was a great deal of official anti-semitism, which made it difficult for us to have a thriving Jewish identity, we still remained Jewish. If we survived without religious institutions, we developed other ways of nurturing our identity… There are many varieties of Jewish experience. Mine happen to be culturally based."

Sandler is very positive about the Bridges program. "I'm very optimistic, because I think the timing is right. There are many people like myself who have grown up in Canada and who feel equally comfortable on both sides of the divide, if you will."

She said that mentorship provides "an informal kind of connection. It's good insofar as it provides somebody like myself with a bit of guidance and mentoring in terms of how the federation works." She has become involved with the federation's "emerging communities" committee.

Shoel Silver, co-chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Committee for the Unity of the Jewish People, is a longtime community leader and a mentor in the Bridges program. He said he thinks it's important for the community to have "breadth of leadership" in terms of where leaders come from, where they live in the community, and their life experiences.

"We should reach out and make sure as many as possible are engaged at leadership levels."

On a personal level, he said, the program is meaningful to him because it allows him to hear the perspective of people he wouldn't otherwise meet. "I think both sides are mentors and mentees."

Sephardi sages love the Land of Israel

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

As rabbi of the only Sephardi congregation in Western Canada, I am frequently asked about the Sephardi perspective regarding the holiday of Yom Ha'atzmaut. Do we celebrate it? How, historically, do the Sephardi sages regard the Land of Israel?

I usually answer that our sages attach a great deal of importance to the Land of Israel, making it clear that it is a focal point of our existence.

Besides the fact that the Torah speaks about the Land of Israel as the Promised Land, promised by God to the Jewish People, Sephardi chachamim throughout the generations have expressed their love of the Land through song and poetry.

In modern times, immediately following the creation of the State of Israel, Yom Ha'atzmaut was celebrated in Sephardi countries by the entire community.

The emphasis, however, was different than it is today.

The rabbis emphasized and embodied the religious perspective – the beginning of our redemption – through thanksgiving and celebration on Yom Ha'atzmaut. For them, it wasn't about "Hallel with or without a brachah." It was about giving praise to HaShem through the recitation of Tehillim and Hallel for the great miracles and gifts that we recognize on this special day.

Well before modern Israeli poets wrote of their love for the Land of Israel, Sephardi poets – Rabbi Yehuda Halevy (12th-century Spain), Rabbi David Hassin (18th-century Morocco), Rabbi Yosef Haim (19th-century Baghdad) and Rabbi Raphael Antebbi (19th-century Aleppo), among others – wrote about the beauty and holiness of the Land.

Subsequently, after the establishment of the State of Israel, there were Sephardi poets and rabbis – for example, Rabbi David Bouzaglo of Morocco, Asher Mizrachi of Tunisia, and Rabbi Frija Zuartz of Libya – who wrote of their love and renewed appreciation of the Land of Redemption. Their moving words often elicit tears when I read or sing them.

These words also bring me much hope and comfort at times when it's hard to avoid becoming despondent over our future and what's going on in the world in general. These rabbis often experienced atrocities, even death, in their countries of birth. Just as they took comfort in the Almighty, we, too, must strive to develop our faith and to strengthen our resolve in our times.

One of the stories – a story about faith – that I cherish most is about Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, the former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel who visited Vancouver in 2008. A certain individual asked the rabbi for his thoughts concerning a new book discrediting the splitting of the Sea of Reeds. The rabbi responded simply, "The author of the book is an idiot!" The rabbi said that his parents taught him about that event and their parents them, asking finally, "All of them were wrong and the author of this book is right?"

On Yom Ha'atzmaut we are reminded that our faith and our history have been transmitted to us in an unbroken chain from one generation to another, from Sinai to this day. Let us thank God as we celebrate both our Jewish history and our national renewal by rejoicing on this Day of Independence.

"...Camp Magnetawan made a real difference in my life. I encourage any kid who's thinking about it to go."

– Seth Posluns, former Youthdale and Camp Magnetawan participant

Camp Magnetawan's specialized program and 2:1 camper to staff ratio caters to children and youth with social or behavioural needs that might go unnoticed in a larger camp environment.

The camp is sensitive to the cultural and culinary needs of its participants. Our consulting Rabbi educates the entire staff to be supportive of a child's Jewish identity, and Shabbat prayers are available Friday evenings. Camp Magnetawan also provides an opportunity for Jewish and non-Jewish children to learn about themselves and each other in a fun and supportive atmosphere.

Victoria shul set to mark 150 years

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — Victoria's Congregation Emanu-El is approaching its 150th anniversary in June 2013, an important milestone for Canada's oldest synagogue in continuous operation.

Plans are underway for a gala weekend celebration of the Vancouver Island synagogue's birthday next year, with a recreation of the shul's inaugural 1863 parade, which was joined by the mayor and Freemasons of the day.

It's expected the current mayor and local Freemasons will join the event as well.

The 220 member families of Victoria's Jewish community are more active and committed than ever, said Michael Bloomfield, a member of Avodah, the congregation's social action committee.

"In the 18 years since I moved here from Ottawa, the community has changed a lot," he said. "There's been an incredible jump in energy and vitality."

Bloomfield attributes the increased vigour to a couple of factors, prime among which is an increase in the number of Jews in town. "In the '70s and '80s Victoria was struggling economically, but now we have a lot of new, younger families, people with professional careers," he reflects. "The advent of e-commuting has brought a lot of very talented people into the community."

He estimates there are between 2,000 and 2,500 Jews in Victoria, roughly double the number in the 1980s.

The congregation has also been energized by its social action work, which was inspired by Rabbi Harry Brechner, Congregation Emanu-El's spiritual leader, eight years ago.

In its first project, titled Out of the Rain, community members assisted the YMCA in providing and distributing food for street youth during the cold, winter months.

Jewish food quickly became a coveted item. "The kids would always ask 'When is the Jewish community coming?'" Bloomfield recalled with pride. "They preferred the food and the portions we provided."

In subsequent projects, Avodah helped to deliver new socks to homeless and impoverished individuals in the capital region. Since 2005, some 50,000 pairs of new socks have been donated to the needy on Vancouver Island by Toronto-based McGregor Socks.

Avodah's work in the community has deepened the synagogue's relationship with other faith communities, as well as First Nations leaders and local government officials, Bloomfield said.

The level of respect, care and co-operation was especially evident when vandals desecrated the Jewish cemetery with swastikas several months ago.

"The rabbi and I decided not to let the vandalism devolve into a sympathy session," Bloomfield said. "We sent the word out about a vigil through social media and our message was 'No, this is not who we are, and whenever this happens to anyone we will gather to denounce it and to stand for respect.'"

Attendance at the vigil, held at the cemetery in January 2012, was remarkable, he said.

"A stream of people became a river until there was nowhere left to stand. Virtually every church, all the faith communities, First Nations, mayors and members of the legislature came to stand with the Jewish community on a cold, drizzly day. That's what the social action component of Congregation Emanu-El has earned from the community at large."

There have been other signs of respect and appreciation in recent years, particularly from homeless people that Avodah has been helping.

One Shabbat morning in December 2011, Rabbi Brechner left the synagogue through the front door and noticed that someone had drawn a message in chalk on the steps outside.

His stomach turned as he anticipated an antisemitic screed, but the words he read took his breath away.

Someone had written, "Thank you for the socks."

Another time, a group of homeless people noticed someone trying to break into the synagogue's second floor. They immediately called police to report that there was an attempted break-and-enter in progress at "our synagogue."

"Our relationship with the larger community has given Congregation Emanu-El a stature that's absolutely remarkable," Bloomfield said.

The synagogue, located on Blanshard Street, was built in the Romanesque Revival style, its 4,000 square feet designed to hold 300 people.

It began as an Orthodox shul, adopting Conservative ritual 15 years ago. In 2005 an educational cultural annex was added, where the children's cheder is held.

Plumbing was added for a mikvah at the time, but funding for that project has been delayed.

"Our priority right now is the roof, which will cost $450,000 to be remedied," Bloomfield said, adding that the roof has shifted and changed shape over time, damaging the building and requiring major repairs.

"My understanding was that historically, Jews in Victoria used the ocean as a mikvah or travelled to Vancouver."

At least one of the Torah scrolls at Congregation Emanu-El is more than 300 years old.

Masorti to ordain gay rabbis

JTA

JERUSALEM — Gay and lesbian students will be ordained as Conservative rabbis in Israel.

The board of trustees of the Schechter Rabbinical Seminary voted April 19 to accept gay and lesbian students for ordination beginning with the 2012-13 academic year. The Conservative movement in Israel is known as Masorti.

A seminary statement said the decision comes following a "long process."

"The Schechter Rabbinical Seminary views the serious process leading to this decision as an example of confronting social dilemmas within the framework of tradition and Halachah," or Jewish law, Hanan Alexander, chair of the seminary's board of trustees, said in the statement. "This decision highlights the institution's commitment to uphold Halachah in a pluralist and changing world."

Students are ordained by a beit din, or rabbinical court, made up of three members of the seminary's rabbinic advisory committee, all of whom are members of the Rabbinical Assembly of the Masorti/Conservative movement.

The beit din members are chosen by the candidate and subject to the approval of the seminary's dean. They have different opinions regarding the ordination of gay and lesbian students, according to the seminary.

The Israeli seminar's decision brings the Masorti movement in line with the American branch of Conservatism, whose rabbinical seminaries have been admitting gay students for some years.

The question of whether or not to ordain gay and lesbian rabbis has been rattling the movement for the past decade.

Years of discussion led to two contradictory religious rulings in 2006, one allowing the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis and another banning it. The movement's two U.S. rabbinical seminaries allowed ordination, while seminaries in Jerusalem and Buenos Aires did not. The issue nearly caused a rift in the movement.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

על מחיר המייפל סירופ:

השנה השתגע כאן החורף לגמרי. לא היה צורך לפנות שלג אפילו פעם אחת, והניצנים בקעו באמצע פברואר. ואז, לקראת אפריל, שקענו פתאום שוב במכת קור שבילבלה לטבע את היוצרות. לפני כשבוע נסענו לבקר בחווה של מנוניטים בסנט ג'יימקובס, שעוסקים בהפקת מייפל סירוף על ידי חליבתו מהעצים הגבוהים, אחרי שאלה צברו עשרות רבות של גלונים של הנוזל הצהבהב והמתקתק במהלך החורף . מסתבר שהשנה היה היבול על הפנים, עם ירידה תלולה של חמישים אחוז בתפוקת המייפל. אחד מהמטיילים שאל לתומו את המנוניטית הצעירה שהדריכה אותנו: "אז אם כך-אפשר להבין שמחירי המייפל סירופ עלו בצורה תלולה השנה?" נזעקה הבחורה המארחת כמו מי ששמע דבר תועבה חמור ואמרה: "לא, לא, מה פתאום! המחיר כאן נשאר ללא שינוי והוא לא מושפע מן היבול". דבריה נגעו בי עמוק וטלטלו אותי בחוזקה: הערכים של פעם- חיים לפי הטבע, הסתפקות במועט, ללא בצע כסף. לפני שהמילים "היצע וביקוש" הומצאו. אנשים נקיי כפיים שאינם סבורים שאתם צריכים להיענש, אלא דווקא הם עצמם.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

מדוע הקב"ה לא קיבל פרופסורה?

ושלא תחשבו שהוא לא ניסה!

השבוע פורסמו המלצות המועצה להשכלה גבוהה שדנה בבקשתו, ואלה היו שיקוליה מדוע לא לתת לו את התואר:

•הוא לא פורסם בעיתון מקצועי,

•לא היו בספר שום ציטוטים (רפרנסס),

•לרבים יש ספקות אם הוא כתב אותו בעצמו,

•ומאז כבר חלפו עידנים בלי שעשה משהו חדש,

•עד היום אף אחד לא הצליח לחזור על הניסוי שלו,

•הוא מעולם לא פנה ליוועדה אתית לקבל אישור,

•כשאחד הניסויים שלו הלך עקום הוא ניסה להסוות את זה והטביע את המשתתפים,

•את שני הסטודנטים הראשונים שלו הוא גרש בצעקות,

•הוא לא משתף פעולה עם קולגות,

•אין לו כמעט שעות קבלה,

•בפעמים הנדירות שהוא מוכן להיפגש- זה על ראשי הרים.....

אומללותם של אנשי טורונטו:

טורונטו נמצאת בצמרת כל המשאלים הבינלאומיים: איכות חיים מעולה, כלכלה יציבה, הרמוניה בין מיעוטים, חינוך טוב, אופטימיות, ועוד כהנה וכהנה. יש רק קבוצה אחת של אנשים בטורונטו שנחשבת לאומללה בכל העולם. מאחר והקבוצה הזאת כוללת כמעט כל ילד ומבוגר בטורונטו- זה הופך את כולנו לאומללים חסרי תקנה. הקבוצה הזאת, אם לא ניחשתם, הם חובבי הספורט.....ובטורונטו יש קבוצות מקצועיות בכל ענפי הספורט:

קבוצת ההוקי שלנו לא זכתה באליפות מאז 1967 ולא הגיעה לפלייאוף כבר שבע שנים.

קבוצת הבייסבול לא זכתה באליפות כבר עשרים שנה,

קבוצת הכדורסל משרכת באופן רגיל בסוף הטבלה,

קבוצת הכדורגל חוגגת כל פעם כשהקבוצה איננה מפסידה,

וקבוצת הפוטבול מביישת את אוהדיה הבודדים כמעט כל עונה.

אז למה מה? בטור הבא אשתף אתכם בסיבות. אבל בתנאי שישאר בינינו.

We can't assume Iran is rational

On Feb. 19, America's most senior military officer, Gen. Martin Dempsey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, appeared on Fareed Zakaria's CNN program GPS. The appearance sparked a heated reaction from Israel after Dempsey claimed that he and the Central Command, which he leads, are "of the opinion that the Iranian regime is a rational actor" and can be dissuaded from nuclear recklessness by economic sanctions, diplomacy and defensive preparations.

While that particular controversy has since cooled to a degree, what remains hot is the issue of whether Iran is indeed a "rational actor." After all, that assumption underlies the belief, widely held by many in the West, that if Iran acquires nuclear weapons, it can be deterred from using them in a first strike against Israel or any other potential target.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Zakaria himself, following up from his interview with Dempsey, said that he agreed with the general, adding the following: "It's very important to understand, however, what it means to talk about a 'rational actor.' A rational actor is not a reasonable actor. It is not somebody who has the same goals or values as we have. In international affairs or economics, the term rational actor is used to describe somebody who is concerned about their survival, prosperity or strength and is making calculations on the basis of these concerns. It describes someone who calculates costs and benefits."

Zakaria was reflecting the common assumption that Iran is "not suicidal" and would not dare attack Israel with nuclear weapons, only to be attacked in kind by an Israeli second strike that could inflict massive, if not fatal, damage on the Islamic regime.

In the April 12 Toronto Star, John Polanyi ("Trust deterrence, not bombs") simply assumed that Iran is a "rational actor" and so can be deterred, as have other nuclear-armed countries, from using nuclear weapons. Yet neither he nor anyone else can or should have confidence in that assumption where Iran is concerned. An Iranian leadership that denies the Holocaust, accepts as fact all manner of anti-Jewish conspiracy theories, and has repeatedly threatened to wipe Israel "off the map" cannot be trusted to act in a "rational" manner.

It pays to remember that it was former Iranian president Hashemi Rafsanjani – someone often described as a "moderate" – who boasted in Tehran more than a decade ago that one nuclear bomb would destroy Israel while costing Muslim states "damages only."

Iran's current president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, an extremist by comparison, believes deeply in the return of the Hidden Imam, the Mahdi – a return that can be realized through an apocalyptic war. (Indeed it was at the UN General Assembly where Ahmadinejad announced to the world his desire to hasten the return of the Mahdi.)

While Ahmadinejad is not in charge of the nuclear program – it's under Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei's control – the religious apocalyptic vision is widely held within Iran's ruling circles. Whether Khamenei and others in the leadership will act on this belief we cannot say.

Yet no one can say with confidence that they won't. And that's the key point.

The New Republic's Leon Wieseltier had some thoughts on this subject that are worthy of careful reflection:

"Sick minds have been distributed all across the human race, and nuclear weapons are the greatest gift ever given to sick minds, and sick minds sometimes come to power. Moreover, they sometimes hold worldviews that, in moments of anger or bliss, may weaken the appeal of logic. Who dares tell Israel that the president of Iran's promise to incinerate it means nothing? Threat assessment is indeed a supremely empirical activity, but security planning can be crippled by a diminished sense of possibility. It is one of the stranger features of the debate about Iran's nuclear program that people who are ordinarily anguished about nuclear proliferation can in this instance suddenly live with it."

Attias ready to embrace Canadian culture

He also helped plan 1991's Operation Solomon, in which over the course of 36 hours, non-stop flights by El Al cargo planes and IAF transport aircraft flew more than 14,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

Attias also oversaw the move of the IAF's cargo base from Lod to the Nevatim air base in the Negev. He then commanded the Nevatim base from 2008 to 2011. He considers the transfer to be one of the country's greatest strategic moves, as it consolidated both the IAF fighter and cargo units, as well as helped create jobs and infrastructure to further settle the Negev.

He said he considers his inaugural posting to Ottawa both an honour and a challenge. Scheduled for a 2-1/2-year term, Attias said he's paving the way for his successors and hopes to open many doors for Israel with Canada's military industries and to connect Canadian firms to opportunities in Israel.

He said acclimatizing to the change in culture, and temperature, are two of the more difficult hurdles he's faced so far.

"A friend of mine in Nova Scotia told me I was crazy for coming here, especially in December," he joked. "But the welcome my family and I have received from Canadians, and especially from the Canadian military [representatives] in Ottawa, has been amazing. Everyone has been helpful."

From a community standpoint, he said as an Israeli Jew, he's slowly learning just how much the Canadian Jewish community supports Israel.

"Israelis are starting to understand that Canada is a separate entity from the U.S.," Attias said. "And, in my opinion, Israel needs to start separating the two a little more. To achieve that, we need more interaction between Canadians and Israelis, but not just on a governmental level."

On a personal note, he said he's excited to have the opportunity to watch more hockey – a sport he's always been "crazy for," even growing up in Israel, he said – and to learn how to skate.

One of his first social events in Ottawa earlier this year was playing in a friendly hockey game between diplomats and a team made up of Canadian military personnel led by Gen. Walter Natynczyk, chief of defence staff with the Canadian Forces.

It was just Attias' fifth time on skates, and he told Radio-Canada at the time that he spent "more time on my butt than on my skates."

Attias said he's determined to become a better skater, and his family has already adopted the Ottawa Senators as their favourite Canadian sports team.

"My family and I think we'll have a great tour here. The way Canadians embrace and respect different cultures is impressive."

Intercamp Classic aims to raise $100,000

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Camp culture has always been a big part of Josh Howard's life.

His family owns Camp Tamarack in Muskoka, Ont., as well as the Zodiac summer day camp and swim school in Toronto.

Since Howard, 24, graduated from university in 2010, he's assumed a role in the family business as Tamarack's business development director throughout the year, and he returns to the camp each summer as its program director.

Three years ago, when Howard reflected on the positive influence camp life has had on him, he decided he wanted to give back.

"At camp you develop valuable social and physical skills, you build on things like self-esteem and confidence," Howard said.

"I think giving back to the community is important. I think every kid should have the experience."

Josh and Jennie Howard

On May 6, the third annual Intercamp Classic, held at the Powerade Centre in Brampton, Ont., will host more than 1,200 people who also believe in the benefits of going to camp.

The Intercamp Classic is a fundraising initiative organized by Howard, his sister Jennie Howard, Camp Walden alumnus Noah Sliwin, and Camp Manitou alumnus Spencer Hoffman.

The goal of the day-long sports tournament, including 68 teams and more than 700 players, is to raise money for Kids In Camp, a charitable organization established to financially assist families to send their kids to camp.

Howard said last year, the Intercamp Classic raised $90,000. This year, the goal is $100,000.

Howard added that they chose Kids In Camp – a charity founded by the late Ted Cole and his wife Elaine, former camp directors of Camp Walden – because it was personal to them.

"I've known Elaine for years. Ted and Elaine were friends with my parents for years and being a camp person myself, I think every kid should have the experience," he said.

"I think a lot of people who entered the tournament feel the same way, which is why they're participating and raising money for a great cause."

Campers, staff and alumni from camps including Tamarack, Manitou, Timberlane, White Pine, Wahanowin, Walden, Ramah and Northland can decide whether they want to compete in men's softball, men's flag football or women's handball.

In addition to the tournaments, the event will also include food, music, inflatables and a silent auction.

"The minimum amount we ask for each team to raise is $1,200, so if you have 10 players on your team, it ends up being about $120 per player, but many teams go above and beyond and raise thousands," he said.

To contact the organizing team, e-mail intercampclassic@gmail.com, or call 416-782-0736.

Western students take part in multi-faith seder

Why is this night different from all other nights?

Every year, Jewish families around the world ask this question during our customary Passover seders. Such a query is traditionally asked by the youngest child at the seder, to symbolize youthful confusion toward the idiosyncrasy of Passover rituals.

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

Being the youngest at most of my seders, I am usually the elected guest to ask the Four Questions. Well, this year, I posed the Passover conundrum a bit ahead of time. That is because this year Passover arrived early at the University of Western Ontario.

With the invaluable assistance of some Western Hillel staff and members, as well as a couple Muslim and Christian student leaders, I was able to organize a multi-faith seder to celebrate Passover in an unconventional manner.

About 45 students, including Jews, Muslims and Christians, gathered together to learn about one another's religions and springtime holidays.

This experience taught me how important it is to be educated about different cultures and religions. The multi-faith seder exposed me to religions that I knew little about, strengthening my respect and interest in both Islam and Christianity.

Above all, teaching non-Jewish students about Passover only solidified my love and passion for Judaism.

The seder was divided into many different parts. This gave Jewish participants the opportunity to lead various segments, such as explaining the significance of eating bitter herbs with charoset or why we dip the karpas into saltwater.

As the seder proceeded, it became obvious that each student was engaged with the speakers and eager to learn about the Passover story.

At various intervals in the seder, Muslim and Christian students were allotted time to discuss their own religions and its connection to Passover and Judaism at large. To my surprise, scores of similarities were quickly unearthed.

Specifically, similar to Passover's dietary restrictions forbidding Jews to eat chametz, Muslims undergo the annual Islamic month of fasting known as Ramadan, when Muslims refrain from eating and drinking from sunrise to sunset.

This time period is intended to teach Muslims about humility and compliancy to God.

Similarly, the Jewish eight-day prohibition against chametz exists in its duality to have Jews demonstrate their compassion for our enslaved ancestry by desisting from bread, while also reminding us to be thankful for HaShem's strength in redeeming us from bondage in Egypt.

Moreover, the Christian participants taught the rest of the students that Jesus' last supper is in fact biblically referred to as the Passover meal.

Furthermore, Jesus is recognized as the "Lamb of God." In ancient times, the lamb was a solemn sacrifice for both Jews and Christians, evident in the Passover story by the use of lamb's blood in marking Jewish homes to be spared from the 10th plague in Egypt – slaying of all first-born children.

What made the seder so successful was that all 45 students in attendance were genuinely interested in sharing and learning. In order to foster interfaith dialogue and friendships on campus, preconceived notions must be cast away in order to progress.

I believe that such an interfaith event was long overdue at Western. It is now clear that a safe domain to discuss the three Abrahamic religions, leaving political differences at the door, is imperative in growing as a cohesive student body. It is far more beneficial for each faith to bond over our shared values.

Comparable to the Passover story and various other times in Jewish history, both Islam and Christianity possess antiquities tempered with epochs of oppression or slavery. In every such case, there were demands and pleas for social justice and redemption.

The famous quote by Martin Niemoller, the Lutheran minister and early Nazi supporter during the outset of the Holocaust, is written on a wall in the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

After alluding to socialists and trade unionists, the end of the quote reads, "Then they came for the Jews, and I did not speak out – because I was not a Jew. Then they came for me and – and there was no one left to speak for me."

It appears that because of religious and [illegible] dissension, we are all losing sight of the basic humanity that binds us together. Most religions hold similar platforms that encourage the use of spirituality to benefit its believers as well as society at large. We should aim to foster a culture that actively supports and embraces humankind's religious sameness and diversity, one interfaith initiative at a time.

OBITUARY

Rabbi Jonathan Plaut served shuls in Windsor and U.S.

Compiled by CJN Staff

Rabbi Jonathan Plaut

Rabbi Jonathan Plaut, spiritual leader of Temple Beth Israel in Jackson, Mich., died April 17 after a long battle with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis. He was 69.

Rabbi Plaut was ordained in 1970 by Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, Ohio, and earned a doctor of Hebrew letters degree there in 1977. He also received an honorary doctor of divinity degree in 1995 from Hebrew Union College.

Rabbi Plaut, son of the late Rabbi Gunther Plaut, the longtime Holy Blossom Temple spiritual leader, first served Congregation Beth El in Windsor, Ont., as senior rabbi until 1984. While there, he was credited with helping the synagogue double its membership.

During his time in Windsor, he was also editor of the Journal of the Canadian Historical Society and Through the Sound of Many Voices: Writings Contributed on the Occasion of the 70th Birthday of W. Gunther Plaut.

In 2009, Rabbi Plaut received a doctor of laws degree (honoris causa) from Assumption University, which is in federation with the University of Windsor.

For more than a decade, he hosted a weekly religious news program on CBET-TV television and CKWW radio in Windsor.

In 1985, he was the youngest person to receive Windsor Jewry's highest communal honour as the Jewish National Fund's Negev Dinner honoree.

After Congregation Beth El, he assumed the pulpit of Temple Emanu-El in San Jose, Calif., where he remained until 1993.

He eulogized his father, the late Rabbi Gunther Plaut, at Holy Blossom Temple in February.

The younger Rabbi Plaut leaves his wife of 47 years, Carol, son and daughter-in-law Daniel Plaut and Amy Cohen, and daughter and son-in-law Deborah and David Elias. He was the grandfather of Steven and Jeffrey.

Politicians denounce Val Morin vandalism

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec Immigration and Cultural Communities Minister Kathleen Weil denounced the break-ins and vandalism earlier this month of Val Morin summer homes owned by chassidic Jews as having "every appearance of acts of a hateful and racist character."

However, by late last week, the Sûreté du Québec (SQ) had not labelled the vandalism, which included the painting of swastikas and the slogan "F--- juif" on and inside at least two of the houses, a hate-motivated crime, as defined by law.

Many of the rest of the 15 were ransacked or vandalized in other ways on or around April 12 to 15. Nothing was reported stolen.

No one was living in the homes at the time. They're part of an enclave of about 50 cottages owned by members of the Belzer community of Montreal. The two daubed with antisemitic graffiti were on 17th Avenue.

Kathleen Weil

SQ spokesperson Sgt. Benoît Richard said April 18 on a Montreal radio station that only after the person or people responsible for the crime are arrested and questioned about their reasons can police recommend hate charges to the Crown attorney.

Richard said it's possible that the vandalism was committed by "kids" who don't understand the meaning of the swastika or its connection to Jews.

"We are not saying it was not motivated by hate. To be sure it looks like that… but it is too early to say, without a doubt, that it is. It is not our duty to characterize the type of crime. Our job is to investigate and give the Crown attorney the specifications of the crime, and he will decide what charges are to be laid," Richard said.

He said that the investigation is continuing, and the SQ is working with the Belzer community.

Richard noted that the SQ is currently investigating about 25 incidents in total reported by the Jewish community, not only in Val Morin, but also nearby Val David and Ste. Agathe in the Laurentians.

The SQ does not have a team dedicated to investigating hate crimes, he said, but some investigators are specialists in that field. They have not been called in at this point.

Pinkas Feferkorn, one of the Val Morin residents whose house was broken into, told The CJN that logically this should be termed a hate crime, especially in view of the fact that no robbery occurred.

He's not sure if applying the term would have any practical effect on how the police handle the case, but he does think it would reassure the community of how seriously it's being taken.

Feferkorn also thinks the hate crime designation would send a message to the public and to the government that the chassidim of Val Morin are living with prejudice on a daily basis. (The community spends about two months a year in the village.)

"It's not like in the city. People out there look down on us, like we're second-class citizens, or strangers. Last summer, every day when the boys were going to yeshiva, somebody went by in a car and yelled 'juif' this or that to scare them.

"Antisemitism is going on here. The police and government try to cover up and say everybody is happy. The government has to fix society."

Weil, speaking on behalf of the Quebec government, stated April 18 that the Val Morin crime is "unacceptable and does not reflect in any way the values of tolerance and openness of Quebec society."

D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman, chair of the government caucus, also condemned what happened.

He said that he's outraged by the crimes, especially "the hateful graffiti."

"I wish not only to condemn these acts, but also to condemn all expressions such as these of racism, intolerance, hate and antisemitism. We live in an open and tolerant society in which there is no place whatsoever for these despicable acts which reflect prejudice and discrimination," Bergman said in a statement.

The day before the Quebec politicians officially responded, the Val Morin "antisemitic" vandalism was denounced by Jason Kenney, federal minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism.

"I join with other Canadians in deploring the cowardly and odious acts of vandalism that targeted Jewish-owned summer homes in Val Morin," Kenney said.

"Sadly, it is not the first time that hateful individuals have vandalized the property of Val Morin's Jewish community. This only makes this latest incident all the more disgraceful."

(The most recent serious similar incident occurred in 2005 when a house used for prayer was trashed, and about 300 sacred books and objects were desecrated.)

The Belzer community has roots in Val Morin going back many decades.

Israeli-designed drones fly over Quebec

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Israeli-designed drones have begun making demonstration flights out of the small Lac St. Jean city of Alma, in conjunction with Montreal-based CAE Inc.

Last August, CAE, a leader in the manufacture of flight simulators and other aviation training equipment, and Aeronautics Ltd., one of Israel's largest defence corporations, announced an agreement on a research-and-development project in the non-military uses of drones.

Alma's airport is the site of the new Centre d'excellence sur les drones. Located 175 km north of Quebec City, Alma has a population of about 30,000.

CAE announced April 11 that the first series of flights of the Miskam drone had been conducted successfully over a period of several weeks.

"The demonstration flights represent the first phase of an R & D project aimed at demonstrating how unmanned aerial systems [UAS] can be used for civil applications, such as remote inspection of pipelines and hydroelectric installations, surveillance of forest fires, observation of critical natural resources, assessing natural disasters and a range of other applications," CAE said in a statement.

The Miskam is a Canadian version of the twin-engine Aeronautics Dominator XP, which can fly for up to 24 hours and carry a significant payload.

"We are very excited to be working closely with CAE and the entire team in Canada to showcase our UAS capabilities as part of Project Miskam," said Aeronautics CEO Avi Leumi. "As potential customers and the general public at large begin to understand the tremendous benefits offered, we expect the use of unmanned systems to become more widespread."

ICRF to honour four women at annual lunch

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) is honouring four women at its 11th annual Women of Action Luncheon, April 26 at the Sheraton Centre.

Sheryl Abbott, the executive director of the Canadian Cosmetic, Toiletry & Fragrance Association Foundation is being honoured for her company's charity, Look Good Feel Better, which is dedicated to empowering women to manage the effects that cancer and its treatment have on their appearance and, often, on their morale.

Also being honoured are Lisa Borsook, a managing partner at WeirFoulds LLP; Dr. Fei-Fei Liu, a professor in University of Toronto's department of radiation oncology, a staff radiation oncologist at Princess Margaret Hospital/University Health Network and a senior scientist at the Ontario Cancer Institute; Lynn Posluns, the managing director of Cedarpoint Investments Inc., the founder and president of Women's Brain Health Initiative and a community leader.

Joy Wagner Arbus, ICRF's executive director, said that Posluns is the first recipient of the Vicki Campbell "VAST" community award on behalf of Henry Campbell and family, given out to women "who have done exemplary work in the broader community and who have worked hard to make the world a better place."

The luncheon will be hosted by Beverly Thomson, the co-host of CTV's national morning show Canada AM.

For more information, call the ICRF at 416-487-5246, ext. 6500.

SickKids president visits Israel

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Travelling to Israel for the first time this winter with a delegation of hospital CEOs affirmed her beliefs about her own hospital, said Mary Jo Haddad, president and CEO of Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children (SickKids).

"I met doctors who had trained at SickKids, and are now leaders in their field. I had always heard about them, but to meet them in person and have them reach out to me was overwhelming," she said in an interview.

"All my life I have been hearing about and meeting people from Israel, but to see first-hand their passion to make Israel all it can be was amazing."

Since 1997, more than 250 Israeli children have been treated at SickKids. There have also been 28 medical observers and 179 fellows from Israel at the hospital.

Haddad was honoured last week with the Meir Hospital Israel Medal of Merit by Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center, at an awards ceremony and tribute dinner held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Mary Jo Haddad

Also honoured were Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, Dr. Michael Dan and Dr. Amira Dan.

"It is wonderful to be recognized by this hospital, especially in how it relates to children and children's health. We share a passion for the rights of children," she said.

SickKids has partnered with faculty at Meir, including scientists who have conducted research on measuring cancer dugs and on biomarkers of stress in heart patients.

Haddad, who has three children, ages 21, 19 and 15, said that her interest in children's health "came honestly. I grew up in a large family, and was surrounded by siblings and cousins. I always wanted to work with kids, and I built my career around their health care.

"I am amazed by kids. They are resilient and inspiring in the way they respond to adversity and challenges in life, whether these challenges are trauma or disabilities.

A graduate of the faculty of nursing at University of Windsor, Haddad earned her master's degree in health science from University of Toronto, and has made numerous contributions to children's health in Ontario and internationally.

She joined SickKids in 1984, and was appointed president and CEO in 2004, after serving as interim president and CEO.

She holds an honorary doctor of laws degree from the University of Windsor, and is a recipient of the Ontario Premier's Award for Outstanding Achievement. She was appointed a member of the Order of Canada in June 2010.

Visiting Israeli hospitals, she said, she was impressed with the country's health-care system. "I am particularly impressed with the way they use simulation in training medical staff and administrators. Israelis are leaders in that field."

Not surprisingly, Israel also leads in "emergency preparedness, and how they focus on being ready for the worst possible disaster," she said.

The two countries share the belief in a publicly funded health-care system, she said, and in ensuring that every person has access to it.

Chinese medicine in use at JGH

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Traditional Chinese medicine and other non-conventional therapies will have an equal footing with western treatment as care options at the new Peter Brojde Lung Cancer Centre at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH). This clinical and research centre, which officially opened April 18, is being described as the first in a Canadian hospital and one of only a few in North America to fully integrate what are sometimes referred to as complementary or alternative therapies into oncology treatment.

Placing Old Age Security on a Sustainable Path

Canadians are living longer and costs for the Old Age Security (OAS) are rising.

On April 1, 2023 the Government of Canada plans to start raising the age of eligibility for OAS and the Guaranteed Income Supplement (GIS) from 65 to 67.*

What does this mean for you?

54 or older as of March 31, 2012	You may still obtain OAS/GIS at age 65
53 or younger as of March 31, 2012	The age of eligibility for OAS/GIS will change gradually between 2023 and 2029

Starting in July 2013, Canadians who are eligible for, but not yet receiving OAS will have the flexibility to delay receiving it in exchange for a higher monthly amount at a later date.

The number of working-age Canadians for every senior is decreasing

Source: 9th Actuarial Report on the Old Age Security Program

The number of working-age Canadians per senior is decreasing, placing additional pressure on the OAS program.

Unilateral cancellation raises questions

Zvi Bar'el

Mohamed Shoeb, head of the Egyptian Natural Gas Holding Company, announced Sunday evening that the company will terminate its agreement to provide natural gas to Israel.

The decision had been made on Thursday due to what he termed "Israel's repeated breaching of the agreement."

Shoeb, in an interview on Al-Hayat television, stressed that the termination of the deal was due to failure on the part of the Israeli side to transfer the payments owed by Israel for some months and "had nothing to do with the repeated attacks on the pipeline."

The termination of the agreement is not expected to raise Israel's electricity prices, because the recent price hike of nine per cent was made while taking into account that no gas would be delivered from Egypt. Government offices have recently began looking for alternative sources until the Israeli Tamar field begins supplying gas in April 2013.

Despite the announcement, the fact that Egypt's ruling Supreme Military Council and the Egyptian government did not announce the decision officially is puzzling, raising the questions of what motive is behind the decision and how it was decided.

It is possible that the announcement was intended to pressure Israel into calling off the lawsuit for compensation of $8 billion (US) over Egyptian failure to provide gas as promised. This theory agrees with the announcement by diplomatic officials in Jerusalem that the decision stemmed from a "business dispute."

The fact that no official announcement was made may also indicate that the Egyptian government intends to issue a correction or completely deny the announcement made by Shoeb.

However, even if the Egyptian government denies the decision to terminate the agreement, the fact that the company's CEO made the announcement puts the deal in the limelight. If it turns out that Egypt had really one-sidedly decided to terminate the agreement, it could be a dangerous precedent indicating that other agreements between Egypt and Israel may also come to an end.

Israeli soldiers secure the gas terminal near Kerem Shalom on the Israeli-Gaza border as a result of the constant sabotaging of the gas pipeline through Sinai from Egypt to Israel. (Flash90 photo)

The sale of natural gas to Israel was one of the main criticisms the Egyptian opposition voiced against former president Hosni Mubarak, claiming that the price the Israeli company secured was extremely low, cutting into Egypt's national income.

Some have claimed the deal was made possible due to a bribe the Egyptian partner Hussein Salam paid Mubarak's family in order to win the concession. Salam was indicted on this charge but fled Egypt and Egyptian attempts to have him extradited were not successful. The deal has therefore come to symbolize Mubarak's treason and the corruption of his regime.

In addition, Bedouin in Sinai claim that the pipeline and its infrastructure were constructed on their land and they have yet to be compensated as was promised. This is one of the reasons some of the Bedouin families are willing to damage the pipeline and halt its activity.

Since the revolution in Egypt, the agreement to sell Israel natural gas has became one of the charges Mubarak and his circle are being indicted for. Egypt's new leadership promised to look into the price Israel is paying to see if a higher rate can be obtained.

On the other hand, the leadership of most of Egypt's political parties, especially the Muslim Brotherhood, have made it clear they intend to "stand by all the agreements Egypt had signed in the past, including the Camp David accord and the agreement to sell natural gas," Khairat al-Shater, a onetime presidential candidate and other party leaders said.

Egypt's ruling Supreme Military Council and interim government also made it clear to Israel and the United States that all agreements will be kept. This commitment was perceived as a condition for a continued working relation with Israel and the United States, relations that radical organizations and terrorists working in the Sinai are trying to undermine.

The flow of natural gas to Israel and Jordan also symbolized the regime's ability to control the Sinai and ward off the attempt by terror organizations to dictate Egypt's domestic and foreign policies. Both the gas company and Egypt's security forces have made great effort and used a great deal of manpower in securing the pipeline, but after 14 explosions and the failure to get Sinai's Bedouin to cooperate, it seemed that Egypt had given up.

Thus, even if it turns out that a business dispute, and not the failed fight to keep the flow of natural gas flowing against the saboteurs in the Sinai, are what caused the termination of the deal, Egypt's regime may find itself in the midst of a political storm, criticized for neglecting the nation's vital interests and losing its grip on the eastern peninsula, this time because of the deal's end.

With this in mind, it seems likely that the military council will instruct the Egyptian natural gas company to "reconsider" its decision, to avoid the possibility that the cancellation of the deal will become a tool with which the opposition can criticize the regime.

Egyptian gas company cancels deal with Israel

Avi Issacharof and Amos Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Egyptian engineer Hani Dahi, executive director of the Egyptian General Petroleum Corporation, said on Monday that the Supreme Military Council and the government had no part in the decision to terminate Egypt's agreement to provide natural gas to Israel.

Dahi said the decision was made following a business dispute with Israel and had nothing to do with politics. He added that the Israeli side has not fulfilled its economic obligations, despite repeated requests.

Mohamed Shoeb, head of the Egyptian Natural Gas Holding Company, announced Sunday evening that the company will terminate its agreement to provide natural gas to Israel.

Presidential hopeful Hamdeen Sabahi said, also on Sunday, that if elected, he will cancel the gas deal.

Israeli security officials said Egypt has not provided clear answers on the matter, and that during talks in Cairo, Egyptian officials refused to confirm or deny the decision.

Despite Dahi's statements, it is unclear whether the Supreme Military Council knew about the decision. It may have been an independent step taken by the Egyptian gas company, as the economic situation in Cairo remains unstable.

It seems that on the eve of the Egyptian presidential elections, the situation on the ground has never been so chaotic: Egypt still does not have a constitution defining the president's authority, and it remains uncertain who will lead the committee to draft such a document.

On Sunday, in a bid to calm public sentiment, a senior military council member said the elections will take place as planned and that authority will be fully transferred to the elected official.

There is also some question as to whether the decision to terminate the gas supply will affect U.S. assistance to Egypt. Congress has recently warned that its assistance depends on maintaining the peace accords with Israel, yet it did not list the gas agreement as one of the conditions. U.S. assistance to Egypt amounts to approximately $1.3 billion in military aid and an additional $300 million in economic aid.

Under the original agreement, Egypt began delivering gas to Israel in 2008 in the framework of a 2005 political agreement that has significantly enriched Egypt's coffers.

In the context of the growing anti-Israel sentiments in Egypt, the decision comes as no surprise. In recent days, Muslim Brotherhood leaders have launched a smear campaign against Egyptian Grand Mufti Ali Gomaa for visiting Jerusalem's Al-Aqsa Mosque last week – apparently with the Israeli authorities' consent.

Extreme right shows strongly in French vote

JTA

PARIS — French Socialist François Hollande finished first in the initial round of presidential elections, ahead of President Nicolas Sarkozy, while extreme-right leader Marine LePen came in third with an unexpectedly high vote total.

Garnering more than 28 per cent of the vote, Hollande leads over Sarkozy, the incumbent president and conservative leader, who received about 26 per cent of the vote in Sunday's poll.

Hollande and Sarkozy will face each other in the second round of the election on May 6. According to the latest polls, Hollande could defeat Sarkozy by a comfortable margin.

Le Pen, head of the National Front, the country's largest extreme-right party, achieved a historic tally, garnering 18.5 per cent of the vote, the highest reportedly ever achieved by the movement. Le Pen improved on the vote tally of her father, Jean-Marie Le Pen, in 2002, who garnered a little less than 17 per cent of voters, but was able to reach the second round of the election against Jacques Chirac.

The National Front vote tally is alarming, the French Union of Jewish Students said. "Today, more than 7.2 million French citizens have voted for an extreme-right candidate, who openly preaches hatred. They already were 5.4 million in 2002. We are very worried, especially because Marine Le Pen seems to be very popular among young voters," the union's president, Jonathan Hayoun, said in a statement.

The results of the first round were disappointing for two other candidates. Far-left leader Jean-Luc Mélenchon earned a little more than 11 per cent of first-round votes, a showing that did not meet his expectations. Centrist François Bayrou, who appeared as the "third man" during the last presidential race, did not reach nine per cent of the vote this time. The turnout for the election was quite high, with about 80 per cent of the 44.5 million registered voters going to the polls. However, it was lower than the 2007 ballot, when 84 per cent of the electorate participated.

Germans polled about views toward Israel, Iran

JTA

BERLIN — Fewer than half of Germans recently polled believe Iran poses the graver danger in the current tensions between Iran and Israel.

In a survey carried out by the Infratest/Dimap polling firm for Die Welt am Sonntag newspaper, 1,000 citizens of voting age were interviewed on April 17 and 18.

The results stand in contrast to a European Commission flash survey in 2003, according to which most Europeans felt Israel posed the biggest threat to world peace, with Iran in second place.

They also fly in the face of a recent controversial poetic essay by German Nobel Prize-winning author Gunter Grass, who raised a tempest by blaming Israel for the current tensions and criticizing the German government for its subsidized sale of submarines to the Jewish state.

According to the survey on the Infratest/Dimap website, 58 per cent of Germans see Iran's nuclear ambitions as an existential threat to Israel, while 48 per cent see Iran as the greater threat of the two countries.

Only 22 per cent said the two countries are equally threatening, while 18 per cent said that Israel was the more dangerous of the two. The latter group included supporters of the Left Party, which is the most critical of Israel of all the mainstream German political parties. Supporters of all the other mainstream parties pointed the finger at Iran.

The survey also found that Germans in general believe there is no taboo against criticizing Israel.

"Some suggest that one is not permitted to say certain things about Israel and the Jews in Germany," one survey question began. "Others say that in Germany, Israel and its policies can be criticized just as those of any other country. With which of these views do you agree?"

In response, 75 per cent said Israeli policies were just as open to criticism as those of any other country. Again, the Left Party differed from the rest: only 46 percent believed that there is no taboo against criticism of Israel in Germany.

The Left Party has come in for serious criticism over its Israel policies in recent years. In May 2010, three Left Party parliamentarians were aboard the ill-fated Mavi Marmara flotilla boat that attempted to break Israel's naval blockade of Gaza.

Turkey nixes Israeli involvement in NATO summit: report

JTA

JERUSALEM — Turkey has blocked the participation of Israel in next month's NATO summit in Chicago, a Turkish newspaper reported.

Turkey's Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu vetoed Israel's participation during a NATO foreign ministers meeting last week in Brussels, the Hurriyet Daily News reported Monday.

"There will be no Israeli presence at the NATO meeting unless they issue a formal apology and pay compensation for the Turkish citizens their commandos killed in international waters," a senior Turkish official told Hurriyet, referring to the deaths of nine Turkish activists during an Israeli naval commando raid on the Turkish ship the Mavi Marmara as it tried to break Israeli's naval blockade of Gaza in May 2010.

"Those countries who wish to see normalization in ties between Turkey and Israel should advise Israel to apologize and to compensate the killing of Turks in international waters," the official told the news service.

Israel – and other countries, including Egypt, Mauritania, Algeria, and Morocco – is a member of the Mediterranean Dialogue, a NATO outreach program.

It's not the first time Turkey has vetoed Israeli attempts to participate more fully in NATO. It vetoed an Israeli request to open an office at NATO headquarters and vetoed its participation in some Mediterranean Dialogue group activities, according to Hurriyet.

"You are talking about being partners and partnership values. But partners, first of everything, should act like partners, so that we'll treat them accordingly," Davutoglu said during last week's NATO meeting, according to Hurriyet.

Rifle-butt incident cost IDF officer his post

JTA

JERUSALEM — Lt.-Col. Shalom Eisner has been dismissed from his command post following an investigation into an incident in which the Israeli soldier hit a Danish pro-Palestinian activist in the face with his rifle.

Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz relieved Eisner of his position as deputy division commander on "moral grounds," according to the IDF. Gantz said the probe also showed professional and command failures.

In addition to losing his command, Eisner will not become deputy commander of the Bahd 1 officers' training school and will be ineligible to serve in commanding positions for the next two years.

Eisner was suspended from his post on April 15, hours after a video of the incident was posted on YouTube by the International Solidarity Movement. The incident occurred during a protest bike ride in the Jordan Valley. Four activists were wounded, Ha'aretz reported.

Maj.-Gen. Nitzan Alon, the Central Command chief of the IDF, ordered an immediate investigation on April 15 into the incident. Military Judge Advocate General Brig.-Gen. Avi Mandelblit also ordered a criminal investigation of Eisner.

Eisner was interrogated by military police investigators for the first time on April 16, Ynet reported.

Eisner reportedly said he regretted the incident, but said the video represents one minute out of a two-hour event in which the protesters attacked the soldiers, breaking one of Eisner's fingers and injuring his wrist. He is seen later in the video with his wrist and finger in a white bandage.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak's office released a statement April 17 condemning the incident.

"The defence minister has determined, in closed conversations, that there is no contradiction between carrying out operations, appropriate behaviour and preserving the principles and spirit of the IDF," the statement said.

The statement added that Eisner's statements in defence of his actions "are not accepted by the defence minister and were never acceptable by the IDF."

Approximately 200 activists, including Palestinians from the West Bank and foreign activists, rode their bikes along Route 90, the Jordan Valley's main north-south route, on April 14 to protest what the ISM calls on its website "regular harassment and attacks from Israeli settlers and soldiers." Israeli soldiers halted the activists, who were blocking the main thoroughfare to traffic and began taking away their bicycles.

According to Ynet, Eisner said he did not use a water cannon that he had at the scene in order to disperse the protesters, because there was an ongoing dialogue and he wanted to end the event peacefully.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu condemned the incident, saying that "Such behaviour does not characterize IDF soldiers and officers and has no place in the Israel Defence Forces and in the State of Israel."

Israel Briefs

Gas set to flow

An exploration well in Israel is scheduled to produce natural gas in July, just as the country's sole reservoir is about to be drained. Avner Oil and Gas and Delek Drilling announced they'll begin gas deliveries in July from the Pinnacle 1 well, the Israeli business daily Globes reported. The development plan for the well was approved in late March, the companies said. A survey found that the Pinnacle 1 well contains up to 1.3 billion cubic metres of natural gas. The Yam Tethys natural gas reservoir, Israel's only reservoir, is close to running out. Nobel Energy CEO Charles Davidson told Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu during a meeting April 16 that the company will work to start production from a larger reserve, the Tamar field, containing some 9 trillion cubic feet of natural gas by April 2013.

Back to terror

Israel's Shin Bet security service noted two Palestinian terrorists released in the swap for Gilad Schalit have resumed terrorist activity. One of the terrorists, who was deported to Gaza, has written guidelines for future abductions, including "The captive should not be hidden in remote locations, caves, or woodland unless it's a dead body or the captive's head." He also tried to recruit young Palestinians in the West Bank to kidnap Israelis. A second terrorist was sentenced to 44 months in prison last month for arms trafficking. Some 1,077 Palestinians in Israeli jails were released six months ago in a prisoner swap to secure the release of Schalit.

Remembering fallen Machalniks

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Airman Willy Fisher gave his life to the cause of Israel.

Sadly, according to his surviving nephew, most Canadian Jews never heard of the man or his colleagues in the Machal, the group of overseas volunteers who came to fight for the nascent state.

A flight navigator, Fisher, a Winnipegger, perished in the evening of Oct. 24, 1948, while flying for Israel in a Dakota aircraft, along with fellow Canadian Machalnik pilot Wilf Canter and co-pilot Fred Stevenson and English radio operator Leon Lightman, when the plane's right engine exploded shortly after takeoff.

Michael Wimers, an Israeli army liaison, was also killed in the crash.

The flight crew was scheduled to fly from Tel Aviv to Sdom on a re-supply mission.

According to eyewitness reports, the aircraft had just taken off from Tel Aviv airfield when the right engine caught fire. Canter, a Torontonian, attempted to fly to a nearby air base, but the plane spiralled out of control and crashed into the ground near Kibbutz Kfar Yesodot.

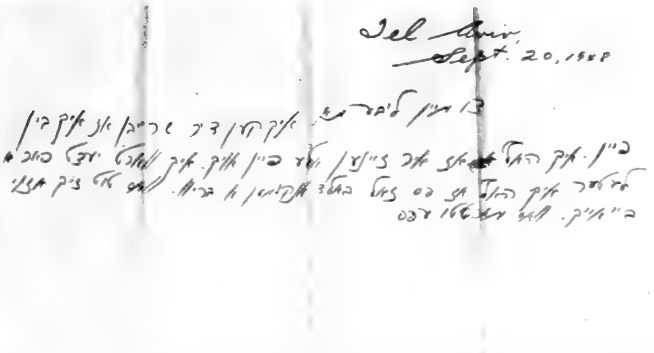
Wilf Mandel, 65, Fisher's nephew, told The CJN it was his mission to keep his uncle's memory – and the memory of the Machal, a Hebrew acronym meaning "volunteer from abroad" – alive and relevant to today's Jewish and Israeli communities. Mandel was just two years old when his uncle died.

On Yom Hazikaron, he said, the community honours the memory of "too many members of Tzahal [the Israel Defence Forces] who at too early an age, gave their lives in defence of the State [of Israel]. We also honour the memories of the victims of terror. We should also remember the 11 Canadian Machal volunteers who gave their lives in the 1948 War of Independence."

William (Willy) Fisher

Fisher, who was only 25 when he died, grew up fatherless in Winnipeg – his father had died before Fisher was born. After graduating from high school, he enlisted with the Royal Canadian Air Force and became a navigator with a Lancaster bomber crew flying missions over Germany in World War II.

"I don't know how many missions he flew, but I learned later that bomber command was the most dangerous [assignment] in all the armed services during World War II. The losses were more than 60 per cent," Mandel said.



A letter from Fisher to his mother, dated Sept. 20, 1948, translated from Yiddish, reads: "To my beloved Ma. I can write to you that I am fine. I hope you are all well, too. I am waiting for a letter that I hope will arrive soon. What is happening with you? How is..."(unfinished).

According to Mandel's research, in July 1948, his uncle embarked on a journey to Israel under an assumed name, because there was a concern shared by many Machalniks that they could end up in trouble with Canadian authorities and lose their citizenship.

Fisher eventually reached the Holy Land at the end of August 1948 and began flying missions for the fledgling state almost immediately.

Mandel said he cobbled together most of the information about his uncle from another Machalnik, Montreal pilot and navigator Yedidia (Eddy) Kaplansky.

"The Israelis had almost no air force training. Nearly 70 per cent of the Israeli air force was Machal," he said.

Kaplansky served with Fisher in Israel and even relied on him as a navigator during September 1948's Operation Taskit. The operation involved Kaplansky's plane dropping pyrotechnics over a number of specifically targeted areas for five consecutive nights while the Israeli Signal Corps operators on the ground monitored various frequencies for enemy signal activity. All of this helped Israeli military personnel accurately gauge the positioning of the enemy.

"I knew nothing about Machal, had never heard about it growing up. Two hundred and fifty Machal from Canada went [to serve] over there, 11 of them died," Mandel said. "It seemed strange to me that not more people know about this. We owe them a debt of gratitude."

The sacrifices and service of the Canadian Machal to the Jewish state is Canada's "bond to Israel," Mandel said.

This Yom Ha'atzmaut we salute all the families in Israel who defend our nation's independence and freedom.

Antisemitism falls

TEL AVIV — Global antisemitism fell by 27 per cent in 2011, according to an annual report.

The Kantor Center for the Study of Contemporary European Jewry at Tel Aviv University presented its global antisemitism report for 2011 on April 18, the eve of Holocaust Remembrance Day.

The report showed that the number of cases of major violent incidents, including threats and vandalism against Jews, was down to 446 incidents from 614. There was an increase, however, in violence against Jews and Jewish property, as well as a rise in their severity.

France had the most hate crimes against Jews with 114, followed by the United Kingdom with 105, Canada with 68 and Australia with 30. Numbers for the United States were only partly included, the centre noted.

Some 42 per cent of hate crimes against Jews were committed against individuals. Synagogues were attacked 20 per cent of the time and schools and Jewish community centres six percent. Jewish cemeteries were vandalized in 14 percent of the cases.

European Jewish Congress President Moshe Kantor presented the report.

"The Middle East conflict has been imported into Europe and serves as an excuse for antisemitic attacks against the Jewish citizens of Europe," Kantor said during a news conference at the Kantor Center.

Retired teacher gives savings to Ethiopian project

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When 87-year-old Yankle Gladstone donated the majority of his estate to a Jerusalem community centre that would benefit Ethiopian olim, it was hardly the first time he took an interest in that ancient Jewish community.

Back to the early 1970s, when they were still known by the pejorative term "falashas," he had donated $25 – " a lot of money in those days" – to help Ethiopians still living in Africa.

More recently, the retired Yiddish teacher joined a number of other Canadian benefactors in providing the $4.5 million needed to renovate a 3-1/2-storey community centre in the Morasha neighbourhood of Jerusalem. The centre, to be known as Canada House, will serve minority communities in the Israeli capital, and Gladstone's donation will be attached to a dedicated room that will help Ethiopians adjust to life in the modern state of Israel.

Gladstone's contribution is a small part of the funds raised for the project, but it represents a greater portion of his wealth than that provided by other contributors, said Steve Solomon, a spokesperson for the Jerusalem Foundation, which partnered with the local municipality in the project.

Gladstone "is a simple teacher. He never made big money, but he put his savings to do something special that he could see and appreciate during his lifetime," Solomon said.

Gladstone joined his niece, Judy, and nephew, Eden, at a dedication and pre-bar mitzvah ceremony, officiated by Ethiopian-born Rabbi Sharon Shalom, at the facility during Passover. The project will launch officially in May 2013.

Gladstone said he is happy to continue to help his Ethiopian "brothers and sisters" acclimatize to life in Israel. That's an endeavour that should not be limited to the well-to-do, he said.

Yankle Gladstone with "his" children in the Absorption Centre on Kibbutz Beit Oren in 1991

"You don't have to be a philanthropist," he told The CJN. "What I gave came from the heart. You can imagine what a Yiddish and Hebrew teacher earned, so whatever I gave is almost everything I had."

While his contribution to Canada House can be measured in dollars and cents, Gladstone has had an even deeper connection with Ethiopian Jews. As a child, studying in Yiddish schools in Montreal, he'd heard about an exotic and remote Jewish people, living beyond a river and out of contact with the rest of the Jewish people.

"I thought they were legends," he said.

A longtime educator and activist, Gladstone was working in the Bronx with black Jews from the Caribbean when he made his first donation to Ethiopian Jewry. He later joined the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jews.

When the first large-scale emergency aliyah took place in the early 1980s – Operation Moses – he was living and working in Israel.

"I was present at the airport during the arrival of Ethiopian children, youths and adults," he said. "That was a moving scene, to see them brought out on stretchers, many getting blood transfusions, many kissing the ground.

"And we were singing. It was an amazing scene of singing and dancing."

At the same time, flights were bringing Jews to Israel from the former Soviet Union. It felt like "ingathering of the exiles," he said. "It was an amazing, amazing experience."

Gladstone, who lived in Israel from 1979 to 1984, ran back and forth between absorption centres and hospitals, keeping families informed about the condition of their loved-ones. Working with Israel's ministry of education, he solicited the help of the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel to provide math and computer tutoring to new arrivals.

Supporting a community centre in the heart of Jerusalem is particularly meaningful to him, Gladstone continued. Ethiopians have always been devoted to Jerusalem. "Israel to them was Jerusalem."

Despite the promise of that first aliyah – a second group would be brought in Operation Solomon in 1991 – Gladstone acknowledges "there are problems. Not enough people embraced the Ethiopian Jews." Their Judaism was questioned by rabbinic authorities, and, like other immigrants, they found it difficult adjusting to Israeli culture and economy.

Solomon noted that Ethiopian Jews who do not do well in school and who fail to matriculate are ineligible for army service. "That's two strikes against them and they get only marginal jobs," he said.

One of the projects contemplated for the renovated centre will be to "help Ethiopian youngsters get caught up and help them academically and socially," Solomon stated.

Gladstone believes the Toronto community should step up and establish a permanent organization dedicated to helping Ethiopians.

As for himself, he remains optimistic Ethiopians, like olim before them, will integrate into Israeli society.

The community centre can only help. "It's important for the Ethiopian community to feel they have a place, a centre. For me, that's a wonderful vision, so Ethiopians feel they belong, they are part of a community centre," he said.

They are part of the people of Israel and "the Jews of the world are my family. The main thing is not that I contributed money, but my soul," he said.

"It's impossible to put into words that you're working with family, who were isolated from me."

Beware! Your cellphone may be in danger

Yair Mor
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — One of the most explosive scandals of 2011 was the News of the World hacking escapade. The newspaper's journalists habitually hacked into celebrities' cellphones to get juicy gossip. Exposure led to a public outcry, and the paper's owner, Rupert Murdoch, shut the 168-year-old institution down.

But a corollary to the sordid story is a helpful one: many people never realized their phones were as vulnerable to hackers as unprotected computers. Smartphone owners are the most vulnerable users as those gadgets usually have a rich mine of data to steal.

In October 2008, when Google's Android operating system for smartphones was still in its infancy, a company named Droid Security got on its feet – right here in the desert town of Sde Boker. Droid developed the first anti-virus application for Google's Android-based smartphones.

After a $1 million (all figures U.S.) investment, two years of operations and 4.5 million downloads, Droid Security was acquired by the security giant AVG for $9.4 million. AVG then turned the company into its R&D arm in Israel.

"We felt that Android devices were likely to supplant personal computers and realized that as soon as there was a new, successful platform, the bad guys would jump on board, too," said Dror Shalev, founder of Droid Security and now the development chief at AVG Mobilation.

Smartphones are essentially powerful computers that are always online, Shalev noted. They contain a huge amount of data on the user – passwords, address books, contacts, bank codes that arrive in text messages, e-mails, pictures, information about friends, information on financial transactions – information the technology world's bad guys would love to have. Droid Security's job is to fight back.

Three and a half years after the company was founded, hacking smartphones has indeed evolved from an after-hours hobby into a full-blown occupation. According to figures from data security company Kaspersky, in 2011 alone, hacker attacks and malware attacks on smartphones grew 200-fold. (Malware refers to malicious software or codes – viruses and that sort of thing.)

In January 2011, the company identified 20 unique malicious software codes making the rounds. By December, that had grown to 4,101.

The variations on those thousands of malware codes are even greater. In December, Kaspersky reported some 82,000 variations. In the first two weeks of 2012, the number had reached 360,000.

Data security company McAfee reported that in the fourth quarter of 2011, computers weren't being attacked by malware as much. But malware for smartphones was taking off. This year, many industry experts say attacks on phones will outstrip attacks on computers.

People's ignorance of the threat just makes it easy for the hackers, said Noam Froimovici, head of A.N. Power Communications, Kaspersky's representative in Israel. That ignorance leads people to merrily download applications that demand their personal information.

There are two groups of threats to smartphones. One is theft of information, such as phone numbers, e-mails and the content of text messages. Such information could be used to hack bank accounts, or e-mail address lists could be sold to spammers.

Hackers get that information using applications cleverly programmed to steal information, or when web users surf infected sites. The bad guys also piggyback on the phones' wireless communications capacity.

"People surf from their smartphones or tablets using WiFi for free but don't realize that wireless Internet and Bluetooth constitute a breach of security," said Erez Mor, Symantec sales manager for the Middle East, Russia and eastern Europe.

For instance, surfing with the help of a public-access wireless network exposes the information that the surfer types into all other devices on the same network. Direct short-distance communications technologies such as Bluetooth can be used to hack nearby phones.

Then there's phone theft, said Froimovici. In Israel, 50,000 smartphones get stolen every year, leading to an abuse of information.

The second group of threats to smartphones is takeover – back-door access that allows the hacker to use your phone without you realizing it. This is the more egregious danger and also the more immediate one, Froimovici said.

For instance, the hacker could use the conquered phone to send premium text messages, such as voting on reality shows, that cost a lot of money, but you get the bill. A call like that could cost as much as $20. Now imagine that a huge number of such calls are made from your phone and you only discover it when the charge arrives.

Another danger in this group is the hacker using your phone to surf the web. Malicious codes often "phone home" to the hacker over the Internet. Again the chief risk here is inflated bills at the end of the month. If a Web user exceeds his package with his service provider, the extra cost can reach many hundreds of shekels.

Why would any hacker want to do that? Well, say experts, a hacker might use "captured" phones to attack websites. Oh yes, and this also uses up the phone battery quickly.

Although all these examples relate to Google's Android system, Apple's iOS system is not immune. In fact, security experts won't say which system is safer. But many suspect that Google's open applications store makes life very easy for hackers – compared with Apple's applications store, where the company's blessing is required before the app can be offered.

There are companies offering software to protect smartphones against all sorts of attacks, and software to operate the phone remotely if it's lost or stolen. The problem is that hackers can exploit that too, offering fake anti-virus systems for phones that do exactly the opposite of what the hapless buyer thinks they will do.

All you can do is be careful about which applications you download. Read critiques of the applications before downloading them. Learn their bugs and weaknesses. Don't go near applications from unknown sources.

Also monitor your phone bills. If you check the history of calls and text messages and can't identify some, alarm bells should go off.

And if your phone starts heating up even though it isn't being used, by you at least, a hacker may be using it to surf the Internet. And finally, use accredited software to protect the device. That one-time investment today could save you a much higher bill tomorrow.

Ghosts of Home recovers prewar Jewish life

It is a rare scholarly work that appeals to both specialist and generalist audiences, but this is true of Ghosts of Home: The Afterlife of Czernowitz in Jewish Memory, co-written by Marianne Hirsch and Leo Spitzer (University of California Press).

Hirsch is a major figure in American academia – and the dominant voice in this collaboration – whose signal contribution to Jewish studies is the notion of "post-memory," which she explores in light of her own experiences growing up under the influence of European-born parents.

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

Her identity, she explains, was overshadowed by their "stories, images, and behaviours" connected with their youth in interwar Czernowitz. "Strangely," she writes, "the streets, buildings, and natural surroundings of Czernowitz – its theatres, restaurants, parks, rivers and domestic settings, none of which I had ever myself seen, heard, or smelled – figure more strongly in my own childhood memories and imagination than do the sites and scenes" of her own childhood.

It is this highly personalized approach to a recovery of a particular European past that renders Ghosts of Home eminently readable. But its pleasures include, too, a detailed portrait of the Bukovina, the far-flung province of the Hapsburg Empire where Czernowitz became a cultural and political outpost of Vienna. There, a large, Germanized, assimilated, bourgeois Jewish community flourished during the last half of the 19th and early 20th century.

This status quo – a paradigmatic example of Jewish emancipation and cultural influence – was undermined after World War I with the rise of Romanian nationalism and its fascist and militarist supporters.

The Holocaust in Romania is not Hirsch's focus, though she does portray the rise of prewar antisemitism, as well as the Romanian state's willingness to deport and incarcerate Jews. One of the quirks of her approach derives from her parents' outlook and memories of their prewar selves. In 1998, Hirsch made her first visit, with her parents as guides, to the Ukrainian city of Chernivtsi. There, with much of the architecture of what was prewar Czernowitz intact, Hirsch strolled the Herrengasse, the main drag of her parents' youth, and found her way into her mother's prewar home, which, however worse for wear, was not greatly changed after 70 years.

Hirsch's parents were both incarcerated with their families in the Czernowitz ghetto, but they managed, again with the bulk of their family, to evade the massive deportation of Jews to the area between the Bug and Dniester rivers known at the time as Transnistria.

Hirsch's parents do not think of themselves as survivors. Their memories of the wartime are in part influenced by their escape from the worst-case scenario offered by Romanian-German collaboration in the Bukovina, but their outlook is coloured, too, by the idea, alive in the minds of many old Czernowitzers, of a "pre-First World War multicultural and multilingual tolerant city and a modern, cosmopolitan culture in which German literature, music, art and philosophy flourished among a significant majority of their numbers."

It is this ideal, its prewar life and postwar memory that Ghosts of Home examines with care and insight. In later trips to Ukraine – most recently in 2008 – Hirsch travelled without her parents and undertook a kind of travel that is sometimes called tragic tourism. She made her way to the deportation sites of Transnistria, as well as to the Vapniarka concentration camp, where she found a complete lack of memory, whether among the local population or by way of memorials at the site of atrocities.

Ghosts of Home concludes in Chernivtsi, with an account of the newly founded Bukovina Jewish Museum of History and Culture, which is housed in a building that once belonged to the Jewish community. Though Hirsch finds the contents of the museum lacking, she recognizes that its goals are "part of a larger movement to revitalize Jewish life in Ukraine... to connect Chernivtsi to a larger religious Jewish world abroad, not to highlight its particular history."

Ghosts of Home brings to light a prewar and wartime history, acted out in an eastern borderland, which most readers will discover anew. Hirsch's depiction of prewar Jewish life is masterful, and her presentation of the challenges of postwar memory is both moving and provocative. Ghosts of Home is a fine example of scholarship that is both serious and intimate.

Hot Docs festival offers films of Jewish interest

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

This year's edition of the Hot Docs documentary film festival runs from April 26 to May 6 and has a fine selection of films of Jewish interest.

A sampler:

Tamar Tal's Life in Stills is both a portrait of a country-in-the-making and of an unusual personal relationship.

The late Israeli photographer, Rudi Weissenstein, was an eyewitness to history. Working out of a modest studio in the centre of Tel Aviv, he photographed people, places and events in Palestine and Israel.

His photographs of early Tel Aviv and David Ben-Gurion's proclamation of independence in 1948 are particularly of value and interest.

When Weissenstein died, he bequeathed his archive of more than one million negatives to his wife, Miriam, who had always been his trusted collaborator.

Now, years after her husband's death, Miriam and her grandson, Ben, are fighting city hall to save Photo House, the landmark studio that served as his base for decades, from demolition.

The studio is supposed to make way for a residential development, but Miriam and Ben oppose it. Can they stop the march of time? That's one theme of Life in Stills.

The other theme focuses on their mutually loving relationship. Miriam is gruff and gloomy, while her grandson is blessed with a sunny disposition. Despite their diametrically different personalities, the pair get on remarkably well, and in this altogether charming movie, which is set in Israel and Germany, Tal skilfully fleshes out their battle for survival.

Life in Stills will be screened on Saturday, April 28, at 9:30 p.m. at the Israel Bader Theatre, Monday, April 30, at 4:15 p.m. at the Cumberland Four-Alliance Cinema, and Saturday, May 5, at 1:15 p.m. at the Bloor Theatre.

One Day After Peace, by Miri and Erez Laufer, is about a dedicated woman's crusade to find peace of mind and, against all odds, to build reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians.

Robi Damelin, an Israeli peace activist originally from South Africa, is still in mourning after the death of her son, David, an aspiring MA candidate in philosophy and education and an Israeli army reservist who was killed in an Arab ambush in the West Bank in 2002, at the height of the second Palestinian uprising.

In this empathetic film, the Laufers explore Damelin's attempt to contact the family of the Palestinian sniper who shot David at a checkpoint as well as following her to South Africa on a journey of self-discovery to talk to South Africans who were personally affected by the now dismantled apartheid system.

The Laufers concentrate on the South African segment of One Day After Peace. Damelin, a dogged woman of conscience, is a whirlwind of activity. She meets mothers whose sons were killed by the previous regime, attends sessions of a national committee trying to heal old wounds and visits a cousin who was Nelson Mandela's lawyer.

For Damelin, the new multi-racial South Africa is a model of hope, a place where enemies can lay aside their differences and grievances and achieve some kind of closure. Clearly, the Arab-Israeli conflict is a tougher nut to crack. But Damelin is not someone who succumbs to despair easily.

One Day After Peace will be screened on Sunday, April 29, at 9 p.m. at the Cumberland Four-Alliance Cinema, Tuesday, May 1, at 11 a.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre and Saturday, May 5, at 4 p.m. at the ROM Theatre.

Film portrays Jewish immigrant experience

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Hungry Hearts – the 1922 silent movie scheduled to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on April 29 at the Al Green Theatre at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. – is something of a cinematic gem.

Based on the short stories of Anzia Yezierska (1880-1970), a Polish-born American writer who brought the experiences of Jewish immigrants to a mainstream audience, Hungry Hearts is touching and compelling.

This 80-minute classic, ably directed by E. Mason Hooper, revolves around the Levin family, a Jewish family that lands in New York City's Lower East Side after emigrating from czarist Russia in 1910.

The family's gentle patriarch, Abraham (E.A. Warren), is a lowly teacher scratching out a living in the rustic town of Goluth. Life in Goluth is pretty predictable, except when Cossacks come calling.

Inspired by an effusive letter from a relative in America, Abraham's wife, Hannah (Rosa Rosanova), begins dreaming of immigrating to the United States. "It must be always sunshine in America," she gushes.

Selling their possessions, the Levins, father, mother and four children, immigrate to the land of their dreams. But the streets of the goldenne medine are not necessarily paved with gold. The Lower East Side is crowded, and the flat they rent is dark and grimy.

"Where's the sunshine?" asks Sara (Helen Ferguson), Abraham's fetching and ambitious daughter, who longs to be a "somebody."

Forced to abandon teaching, Abraham becomes a businessman, selling fruit from a proverbial pushcart. But success eludes him, and Sara must take a job as a janitress before she can find a better position in a shirt factory.

When the landlord's nephew, an up-and-coming lawyer named David Rosenblatt (Bryant Washburn), arrives to collect the rent, he spies Sara and is totally smitten. Much to her parents' delight, they are soon engaged to be married.

Rosenblatt's mean-spirited uncle steps in, threatening to disinherit him if he proceeds to marry a "nobody" like Sara. Rosenblatt wavers, his uncle retaliates and Hannah runs amuk. Facing prison time, Hannah convinces a judge in a courtroom appearance that she should not be judged too harshly. Justice prevails and nearly everyone lives happily ever after.

Only in America.

Hungry Hearts, a tug-at-your-heart tearjerker with a great musical score, is a fine film propelled along by a credible script and stellar performances.

The Koffler Centre of the Arts presents an exhibition of the stunning, bold and often controversial photographs of Tel Aviv-based photographer Adi Nes, who infuses his sense of marginality into his work. His "meticulously crafted interpretations of biblical, mythological and literary subjects propose a critical view of the present while seeking to uncover a universal humanism."

Koffler Offsite at Olga Korper Gallery, 17 Morrow Ave. May 3 to June 2. Opening reception, Thursday, May 3, 6 to 9 p.m. Nes gives a talk at Eaton Theatre, Rogers Communication Centre, 80 Gould St., Monday, May 7, 7 p.m. Free admission. www.kofflerarts.org

Names in the News: Bella (Bel) Kaufman, who is hoping to celebrate her 101st birthday on May 10, is a granddaughter of the legendary Yiddish writer Sholem Aleichem (1859-1916) and as such, was interviewed for the 2011 documentary film Sholem Aleichem: Laughing in the Darkness, which recently enjoyed a Toronto run.

Born in Berlin in 1911, she came with her parents to New York in 1923, earned a degree in literature, and worked as a high school teacher. A writer of occasional pieces for Esquire and other magazines, she also penned a grittily realistic novel about her teaching experiences. Published in 1965 as Up the Down Staircase, it became a runaway bestseller and remained on the New York Times bestseller list for more than 64 weeks.

Last year, at age 99, Kaufman was hired by a New York college to teach about Jewish humour. "I'm too busy to get old," she remarked at the time.

Her second husband, Sidney J. Gluck, runs the Sholem Aleichem Memorial Foundation. She was five years old when her famous grandfather died, and, according to a New York Times story that appeared when she turned 100, she "believes she is the last person alive who remembers him and his impish humour."

The sound of movies

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival presents the 2012 Sidebar series, "The Sound of Movies: Masters of the Film Score". This 12-part series celebrates the lives and works of Jewish composers who create the music for the movies, through the artistry of the film score.

The Sound of Movies marks another chapter in a fascinating story, as the festival continues its exploration of the predominant and extraordinary role that Jewish composers have played in the popular culture.

In the same way that Jewish songwriters and lyricists excelled in their respective genres, most of the "greats" in the world of the film score have been Jewish. Many of them are classically trained or jazz-oriented, and creators of orchestral works and popular songs, as well as movie scores. The first wave—the group who actually invented film music—were exiles from Nazi Germany, Europe and Russia, and they had a profound influence on those who followed.

The series incorporates special guests, rarely screened gems, and events that showcase some of the most renowned and accomplished composers of all-time.

See www.tjff.com for descriptions and times.

Doc celebrates life

Their teacher, a gentle, probing man, challenges their preconceptions as he examines issues ranging from human rights to democracy.

In the main, he talks about the status of Israeli Arabs, much of whose land was confiscated by the state in the wake of the 1948 War of Independence.

He and his students don't often share the same views, but their spirited exchanges infuse this film with vitality.

Soldier/Citizen will be screened on Sunday, April 29, at 6 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema, Monday, April 30, at 2 p.m. at TIFF Bell Lightbox and Saturday, May 5, at 9 p.m. at the Rom Theatre.

Oma & Bella, by Alexa Karolinski, is about friendship, tradition and memory.

Regina Karolinski (Oma) and Bella Katz are Holocaust survivors of a certain age who live together in apparent harmony in a small flat in Berlin. They've been through a lot in their lives, yet they face the world with good cheer and optimism.

The filmmaker, Oma's granddaughter, observes them in various situations and obviously thinks highly of them.

Oma and Bella, from Lithuania and Galicia respectively, celebrate their food traditions, recall the Holocaust and the post-Holocaust era in displaced persons (DP) camps, get their hair done at a beauty parlour, play cards, take a boat ride and meet friends and family at a festive gathering.

In its essence, this is a film that celebrates life, for life is short.

Oma & Bella will be screened on Saturday, April 28, at 6:30 p.m. at the TIFF Bell Lightbox and Monday, April 30, at 4:30 p.m. at the ROM Theatre.

Junior star set to play U.S. college hockey

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Matt Silcoff

Skating for the Vaughan Vipers of the Ontario Junior Hockey League (OJHL), Matt Silcoff received a lot of interest from NCAA colleges, including firm offers from two Division III schools.

In the end, he opted for Middlebury Collegiate in Vermont, a prestigious liberal arts institution that counts Ari Fleisher, former White House press secretary, among its alumni. Silcoff will join the Panthers in August as a freshman left winger.

When it came down to it, Silcoff had to choose between Middlebury and another school with "Saint" in its name. Going to a school with that kind of religious connection just didn't seem right for a guy who graduated from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, he said.

On top of that, he was blown away by the atmosphere at a Panthers game he attended. Packing the Panthers' home arena were 3,000 rabid fans cheering the team on – a remarkable showing for a school that has only 2,500 students.

When you add that to Middlebury's reputation for academic excellence and the chance to foster business contacts, it seemed like a good fit, Silcoff said.

Silcoff, who took the year off after high school to focus on hockey and getting in shape, is now completing the paperwork necessary for the next leg of his hockey journey. Then he plans to hit the gym over the summer to prepare for next season with the Panthers.

Getting the offer from Middlebury, which plays in the New England Small College Athletic Conference, came only after "a lot of hard work," Silcoff said. When other guys his age were out partying, he was in the gym working out. When others were socializing, he was working on his game.

The result, he said, is "the opportunity to go to a school like Middlebury. It's incredible."

Although nothing is yet set in stone, Silcoff plans to study economics at the liberal arts college.

And play hockey and more hockey.

He's already known as a good skater who likes to dish the puck. He admits to getting as much satisfaction, maybe more, from setting up a teammate than scoring himself.

A six-foot one, 180-pounder, he wants to join the Panthers 10 pounds heavier and hopes to graduate in four years weighing 200 pounds. That will give him his best shot at getting noticed by NHL scouts, but he recognizes that few players from Division III ever play in the big league.

A more realistic goal, he said, is to spend some time playing professionally in Europe, like other Division III players.

This past season, Silcoff finished second in scoring for the Vipers. He scored 24 goals and 27 assists in 49 games, including some played with the Lakeshore Patriots.

He was traded by the Patriots (previously known as the Upper Canada Patriots) at the beginning of the season. The year before, he scored 47 points and was invited to Team Canada East's selection camp.

Going back even further, he was named MVP of the GTHL Midget All-Star Game when he played for Vaughan Kings.

In 2011, he played in the Hockey 4Life (Chai Lifeline Tournament) and was named MVP. This past year, he played in the Joel Schwartz Memorial Hockey Tournament, in aid of the Reena Foundation, again being named MVP.

In 2009 he played for the Tanenbaum-CHAT Tigers. He and linemate David Garbuz led the team to the York Region Athletic Association (YRAA) championship.

Garbuz influenced his hockey career in aother direction – east. As in Metulla, Israel.

Both played in the 2009 World Jewish Cup of Hockey, albeit on different teams.

While Garbuz played for Israel, Silcoff was on the Under-18 Team Canada "White" team coached by former NHLer Steve Thomas.

Team Canada White won the tournament, and Silcoff led all skaters in scoring.

He considers it his best summer ever.

"I'd never been to Israel before," he said. "The hockey and the culture were incredible."

After the hockey, Silcoff spent more than a week touring.

"It was just a great time," he added.

In 2010 he tried out for and made the Soo Greyhounds of the OHL, but that didn't last long. He played in the OJHL instead, and he advises guys playing minor midget and midget hockey to consider something other than major junior hockey.

Playing in the OHL was enticing, he said, but you could get hurt, and not get as far as you hope.

"I wanted to get an education. Use hockey as a vehicle to get a good education," he suggests.

It's advice he plans on taking himself.

Israeli wins fencing championship in Moscow

Compiled by CJN Staff

Israel's Yuval Freilich won the men's epee competition at the recent World Cadet and Junior Fencing Championships in Moscow.

Freilich, 17, defeated Poland's Sebastian Majgier by a score of 15-6 in the final, vaulting him into position as number 1-ranked epee cadet in the world.

Freilich advanced to the final with a 15-5 victory over Hungary's Balazs Hamar.

Earlier, Israel's cadet team won second place in the epee event at the European Championships in Croatia. The team, which includes Freilich – who won an individual silver medal – as well as Ariel Drizin, Maxim Pozdnyakov and Daniel Fridman, fell to Ukraine in the final, 45-36.

In the semifinal, the team defeated France 45-35, after beating the Czech Republic 45-36 and Sweden 45-28.

"It's an amazing team achievement," said fencing chairperson Lydia Hatuel-Zuckerman.

WHEN IS A FAILED INSPECTION A GOOD THING?

SOLD CONDITIONAL ON INSPECTION can be nerve racking for Sellers. It's often an excuse for Buyers to kill the deal. Sellers can include a Seller's right to remedy a problem to save the deal but that is not always accepted by a Buyer. Thinking we know our own home we often take the risk and live without the remedy clause.

In such a case 10 days ago, for one of my Thornhill –Spring Farm listings, we accepted an offer of over asking, conditional on inspection, but the deal fell through. After remedying the problem for approximately $1,000 we relisted the property and ....

Writer turns days spent waiting tables into a movie

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

While Michael Sparaga's films have allowed him to quit his job as a waiter and work full time as a screenwriter and producer, he said he will never forget his humble beginnings.

His latest feature, Servitude, hit theatres on March 30. It's a waiter-themed comedy, "so in a way I'm back working in a restaurant," he said.

Sparaga started writing screenplays in 1991, when he was studying film at York University. "Almost everything I wrote back then was a ripoff of Goodfellas, which came out that year and completely blew me away."

Sidekick was the first feature Sparaga wrote and produced. "It's about Norman Neale, a comic-book-obsessed computer geek who discovers that one of the cocky stockbrokers in his office, Victor Ventura, has slight telekinetic abilities. Norman decides he wants to train Victor to be a superhero, so he can become his-sidekick. The only problem is, Victor was always a bit crooked and, as he grows in power, he doesn't have any intention of becoming a hero."

Sparaga produced Sidekick on his credit cards and line of credit while he worked as a waiter to make the minimum monthly payments. "I figured if the film wasn't any good it would just take me a mere 15 years to pay it off," he said.

"I guess it turned out all right because the finished film played in worldwide film festivals, was theatrically released in Canada and went on to sell in numerous international territories, including the United States. Remake rights were even optioned by Universal's Focus Features."

Michael Sparaga

Sparaga said Sidekick attracted the attention of Telefilm Canada, which gave him enough money to take the film cross-country and screen it in eight Canadian cities. While on that tour, Sparaga collected footage for his next film, a documentary on the state of the Canadian film industry called Maple Flavour Films.

He said the original idea was to include the documentary as a DVD extra on Sidekick, but the finished film ended up selling on its own merit and airing on Air Canada flights and pay TV.

Sparaga wrote the first draft of Servitude in 1999, when he was working as a waiter at The Keg. "The idea of waiters taking over the restaurant and treating guests with the respect they deserve is something that I thought about every day, so writing the film was really a catharsis of sorts," he said.

"The best part about waiting tables at night is that you have your days free to write, so that's what I did. Often the events of the night before ended up in the script. Still, when I was finished writing, I was too embarrassed to hand the script out because I thought people would say, 'Oh, you're a waiter,' instead of 'Oh, you're a writer.'"

It took Sparaga a long time to realize he actually liked waiting tables and that it was nothing to be ashamed of. After a decade, he pulled the script out of his drawer and was reminded of how funny it actually is.

Sparaga decided Servitude would be his next feature. He gave the script to Warren Sonoda, a director whose work he admired, and asked him to give it a read. A few weeks later, Telefilm Canada announced it wanted to make comedies again and was starting up the Features Comedy Lab, which would be chaired by Eugene Levy and run in collaboration with the Canadian Film Centre and Just For Laughs.

Sparaga did a quick rewrite on Servitude and submitted it to the Lab, which was looking for five scripts from across Canada to pair with A-list Hollywood comedy talent for development. Within a month, he said he was accepted into the Lab and sitting in a room with Ivan Reitman (director, Ghostbusters) and Etan Cohen (writer, MIB3) working on the next draft.

"It was quite an incredible experience. And in the end, Servitude was the first film green-lit from the Lab for production."

Servitude is "a laugh-out-loud comedy with big fun characters. And a bit raunchy at times, too. Kind of like American Pie in a restaurant. It isn't the sort of film that critics normally bestow praise on, but I'm hopeful. As for audiences, I'm not worried," he said.

"I've screened the finished film in several festivals, including the Just For Laughs Comedy Festival last July, and the theatres are always rocking with laughter."

As a Jewish writer, Sparaga said his background influences his work. "The character of Josh in Servitude is Jewish. He is essentially me at age 25, struggling with the same decision of whether or not he should go to law school or continue waiting tables as he tries to make it as a writer.

"I wasn't sure how much of that sort of thing I would include initially, but it was actually Ivan Reitman who pushed me to make the script more semi-autobiographical."

While Sparaga hasn't waited tables in seven years, he said it "feels surreal to this day. I still get anxious on Friday and Saturday nights, like I'm supposed to be somewhere running around like crazy. But overall, I know I'm lucky to have a job that I love, that doesn't feel like a job at all really and allows me to work in my pyjamas."

Jewish studies major juggles artistic pursuits

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

For most people, multitasking can be a real challenge, but for 24-year-old Mirra Kardonne, it's all part of the fun.

The part-time University of Toronto Jewish studies student is currently pursuing several acting, music and visual arts projects during her quickly disappearing spare time.

"I kind of have many fingers in many different pies, artistically," she said with a laugh.

Kardonne held her debut art show late last month. The exhibition, titled All Descriptions, took place at Toronto's Studio Huddle and featured 11 of her mixed-media works, some of which are as large as 36 by 48 inches.

The paintings in the collection focus on an exploration of identity as it is expressed through the body.

"It's definitely some of the biggest stuff and some of the most ambitious stuff I've ever created," she said.

Although Kardonne's first and deepest artistic love is the theatre, after selling a few paintings while studying Hebrew at Tel Aviv University two summers ago, she felt the draw to spend some more time on her visual artwork.

"With visual arts, I've always felt like I have to strike while the iron is hot – because it's not always hot," she said. Kardonne added that when she feels inspired, she can complete a painting in as little as one or two sessions. "Sometimes the juices are just flowing," she said.

Kardonne said her debut show made her much more optimistic about the potential of her artwork, as about 50 people showed up to the catered event that featured two Gypsy-jazz guitarists, and four of the 11 paintings were sold by the end of the evening.

She also received some requests for commissioned paintings, something Kardonne is very eager to work on.

"I was really nervous. I'd never held an [event] like this before," she said, adding that she was "really touched that people weren't just happy for [her], but they seemed to be impressed."

After the excitement of the exhibition wound down, Kardonne was busy with two major artistic endeavours, on top of several side projects.

She co-produced the April 22 CD release of a jazz recording, The Thing Is, on which her older sister, Tova, sings.

Kardonne is preparing for her first role in a Toronto Fringe Festival play, Honour Killings, written by Harvey Markowitz.

She is also set to appear in a live art show in early May, where she and another performer will create artworks in front of an audience, and she is part of an ongoing YouTube series.

Kardonne, whose father is a playwright, has studied theatre for 12 years, both at acting studios and with a private coach, and still considers it her strongest artistic passion.

But if her love for the theatre is genetic, so is her talent in painting – Kardonne's grandfather was the American artist Joe Kardonne.

Coming from an artistic family has given Kardonne a push forward in her career.

"It's been really nice to have my parents be like, 'If you want to be an artist, be an artist – not a doctor,'" she said of her family's support.

Family history and tradition feature quite strongly in Kardonne's recent paintings. The largest work on display at her debut show was a portrait that was overlaid with her grandmother's death notice, written in Hebrew. The painting, titled simply Death Notice, was the "most laborious" for her to create, but she felt it was important to include in the collection, especially in its original Hebrew.

"One of the things that is me is that I speak Hebrew and I'm a Jewish studies major," she said, explaining that her Judaism is an important part of her identity.

Kardonne began to learn Hebrew when she was 20 and has studied it in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. She began her degree as a philosophy major, but readjusted her studies in order to take up the Hebrew language.

In 2010, Kardonne served as president of the U of T's Jewish Studies Student Union for a semester, and she also recently spent time as an intern at the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Between her studies and the myriad artistic projects and hobbies that eat up her time, Kardonne is finding herself performing a bit of a balancing act.

"I feel like I'm a mad juggler these days," she said, laughing, "but I really thrive on being busy."

Now, as she prepares to graduate this summer, she will have a bit more free time to achieve her artistic goals.

Kardonne said that her latest success with her All Descriptions show has left her very hopeful for a future in the arts, both performance and visual.

Kardonne's wish is to keep juggling her talents and to develop them all as she goes along.

"My wildest dream in five years would be to sort of do the Renaissance-woman thing," she said.

Synagogues, schools and sustainability

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

What does it mean to be a sustainable Jew? That question was the headline of my first CJN column in September 2010. Since then, we have explored many aspects of sustainability in this monthly column. What have we learned so far?

A small segment of our Jewish community that is receptive to this precept of tikkun olam and its interpretation by the many streams of Judaism is still motivated to focus on the environment and take action to leave the world in better shape than we found it.

Keeping Jewish students motivated and connected to environmental concerns is easier in younger grades. Challenges in extending that interest through middle school into high school and on to post-secondary education have not been overcome.

Is there a connection between synagogues, schools and sustainability?

When you talk about sustainability to people involved in the running of these institutions, thoughts quickly turn to affordability and the ability to sustain a viably sized synagogue membership or school student population.

Over Pesach, I discussed the issue of sustainable operations with family and friends. Through those encounters, I've brought together different community views from various cities and countries. Common to all of the discussions was an ongoing increase in labour costs because of the need to pay a living wage to those who teach our children or run our religious institutions. That is not solvable in this column.

However, if you are a member of a board of directors for a synagogue or day school, you have the opportunity to understand how ongoing operational sustainability is affected by energy utilities such as electricity, natural gas and water.

Are you running your own building or are you a tenant, renting part of a larger facility? Do you ever see a utility bill at a board meeting or just a cost number? Does the board have a focus on consumption? Do you know which cost drivers you have control over?

Most boards will see a single number, the amount spent on utilities. Sometimes the number will be broken into three parts, separating the costs for electricity, natural gas and water.

How many boards look at consumption numbers, understand what is connected where, know how much each connected item consumes, and how long the consumption take place? Very few from what I've seen.

What are the variables that need to be considered that can directly affect consumption? Weather can affect the amount of heating or cooling required. Sunlight hours can affect the number of lights required in rooms that face the exterior. Building occupancy schedules can affect the number of hours an area has to be lit, heated or cooled.

It is this kind of knowledge that can lead to informed decisions to improve efficiency and use, which in turn can help the utility portion of operating costs of a synagogue or school stay steady.

Next month, we will look at how informed decisions can be made and consumption reduction achieved, resulting in costs that can be held steady or rise at a slower rate.

This is a reminder...

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

This is a reminder to all Jews that a family once lived in a small shtetl in Poland in the 19th century. One day, they heard horses galloping and then saw the drunken men riding them, pulling knives from their scabbards and waving them above their heads, yelling, "Kill the Jews."

This is a reminder to all Jews on Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut that the family scattered to the nearby trees, but never exited the forest to safety, because the venomous thugs rode hard with a relentless commitment to finding them, knowing there was no country for the family to run to.

This is a reminder on Israel's 64th birthday that once in Berlin, a Jewish factory owner had a wife by the name of Pearl and five children, all of whom were proficient in Torah learning and piano. This is a reminder that one morning, he returned to his factory and found glass everywhere and saw ashes blowing past him, and big iron beams lay melted at his feet.

This is a reminder to all of us that this family had nowhere to hide, no country to flee to, no nation that didn't believe "none is too many," and that one day soon after, the family perished inside a camp, barricaded inside by barbed wire and degraded by the worst corrosion of nature.

This is a reminder to all Diaspora Jews that thousands of Israeli parents have sent their children to the Jewish army, and sometimes to war, and many never saw them alive again. This is a reminder that these young Jewish soldiers took a bullet for every Jew then and every Jew now.

This is a reminder to the Jewish People that our State of Israel is an anomaly because of its diminutive size and burgeoning growth, and because of its absolute refusal to cower to the pogroms of today, cloaked in the guise of missiles and resolutions.

This is a reminder to the world that Eretz Yisrael is the homeland of the Jewish People, a haven for every Jew who might have previously hid among the foliage of fear, and that while we will negotiate, we will never run and we will never scatter, for it is said, "I will gather you from the nations and bring you back from the countries where you have been scattered, and I will give you back the Land of Israel again" (Ezekiel 11:17).

Rest in peace, you Jewish men and women, you Druze and Bedouin, who knew that a shot from the enemy's revolver might some day take you in war or through terrorism, but regardless, you donned the fatigues of bravery.

We embrace your legacy of heroism and thank your parents and families for the ultimate sacrifice of a child, brother, sister or grandchild.

Happy birthday to our State of Israel, born on Iyar 5, 5708 (May 14, 1948). While Moses was never allowed to enter your gates, we know that we have the right to return – should we want to, should we need to. This is a reminder. For this we sing and dance in your honour and thank God for this land, a gift to the Jewish People and all nations.

"We do not rejoice in victories. We rejoice when a new kind of cotton is grown and when strawberries bloom in Israel." – Golda Meir
